Mr. NORRIS. I happen to know Mr. Mahn. He is a perfectly honorable, respectable citizen of Harlan County, Nebr. Mr. Roosevelt had no more loyal supporter in the State than Mr. Mahn. He was absolutely a wholehearted supporter of Mr. Roosevelt; and my own idea is, without knowing anything about the matter except what the Senator has read, that Mr. Mahn wanted to be sure that the Senator from Arkansas knew of the propaganda that was going on, and sent the letter to him for that purpose.

Mr. ROBINSON. As I said a moment ago, the senior Senator from Nebraska may be entirely correct. When I received this matter in an envelope marked "Return to Mahn", it was my inference that Mr. Mahn was sponsoring the propaganda.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no!

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. I merely desire to suggest to the Senator that the whole matter might be cleared up if the Senator could tell us, from the correspondence which he has on his desk, whether or not this gentleman signed one of those slips.

Mr. ROBINSON. He did not sign anything on those slips.

Mr. CLARK. That would seem to bear out the conclusion of the senior Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Without having any evidence on the subject except my knowledge of the man, I am just as well convinced as I am that we are here that the ideas and sentiments expressed in that letter are just as foreign as they possibly could be to any idea that Mr. Mahn would hold. I have known him for a great many years. He may be wrong in the method he has pursued, although he is a very intelligent man. I should have said, without any evidence coming to me, that in the whole United States there is not a firmer or a better friend of President Roosevelt than Theodore Mahn.

I do not pretend to explain anything except that, as the matter appears to me from my knowledge of the man, I reached the conclusion that the purpose of sending the letter to the Senator from Arkansas was to give him information of what was going on, with which Mr. Mahn had no part whatever.

I will say to the Senator that I shall be very glad—and I think I shall be able, too—to find out just exactly how Mr. Mahn feels; and if I have not correctly stated his sentiments, I shall be very glad to state them correctly, either to the Senator or to the Senate.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. Just one moment. In view of the statement of the senior Senator from Nebraska that he knows Mr. Mahn, in whose envelope these messages were sent, and that he thinks Mr. Mahn did not intend to contribute to the propaganda, but desired to inform me of what was being carried on, I will state that it is my purpose to write immediately to Mr. Mahn and find out what his thought was in sending this matter to me. It may be that he did not desire to identify himself with the controversy. There was nothing in the enclosure which would enable one to place a construction on his attitude; and, for that reason, not knowing Mr. Mahn, I assumed that he was lending himself to the propaganda. The important point is, however, that the purpose of Mr. Gerald B. Winrod is to scatter the doctrines of that letter and send those slips throughout the various States.

There is a significance in the fact that the letter emanates from Wichita, but the information supplied me comes from Nebraska. Evidently the proponents of this propaganda believe that they can accomplish something by sending it into other States, which they have a perfect right to do, than the State in which they live and operate. It shows an effort at Nation-wide unfair and, as I conceive it, dishonest propaganda.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want the Senator or the Senate to get the idea that, because I have come to the defense of Mr. Mahn, I agree in any sense with the letter which the Senator has read. I condemn it just as much as does the Senator, and would do so on either side of any controversy. I have no sympathy with it whatever.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand that.

Mr. NORRIS. I simply wished to correct any erroneous idea which might go out as to Mr. Mahn.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator has done a service in pointing out the fact that the purpose of Mr. Mahn in sending the letter to me, or in permitting it to be sent in his envelope, is to disclose the fact that such propaganda is in progress.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have been receiving in my mail a very large number of these same slips, but in two or three envelopes I have received from citizens of Wisconsin the enclosure of the letter which the Senator from Arkansas has received and the slips, unsigned, which I assumed they have sent to me for the purpose of indicating what they had received from this gentleman in Kansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield now to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. I simply desired to ask the Senator how the envelope was postmarked.

Mr. ROBINSON. The envelope is postmarked "Alma, Nebr., February 25, 6:30 p. m., 1937", and on the corner of the envelope is the statement, "After 5 days return to Theo. Mahn, Alma, Nebr."

Mr. BYRNES. This good gentleman from Nebraska has not signed the letter or the slips?

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, no; and he did not send any letter or explanation with the message which came to me.

Mr. BYRNES. It was the gentleman from Wichita who addressed the Senator as "Brother in Christ"?

Mr. ROBINSON. He did not address it specifically to me. It is a circular letter being sent out quite generally and is addressed to "Dear Brother in Christ."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. What title does the signer of the letter use to indicate that he is the chairman of that organization?

Mr. ROBINSON. He merely signs it "Yours in Christ, Gerald B. Winrod."

Mr. President, I shall conclude what I have to say on this occasion by stating that I do not think any Senator from Nebraska, nor do I believe any Member of the House of Representatives from Nebraska or from any other State will be influenced or controlled by such propaganda as that to which I have referred, and my object in making the propaganda public is to give everyone the opportunity to know its source and to know its character.

REORGANIZATION OF THE JUDICIARY—NOTICE OF ADDRESS BY SENATOR LOGAN

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I merely rise to give notice that as soon, after the Senate shall meet tomorrow, as I can secure recognition, I shall at some length discuss the proposal to reorganize the Federal judiciary.

PROPAGANDA—REORGANIZATION OF THE JUDICIARY

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, in further reference to the subject of the propaganda in reference to court reform and as throwing some light on the matter of effective propaganda, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Sioux City (Iowa) Tribune, a strong independent paper, which has on most matters supported the present administration.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Sioux City (Iowa) Tribune]

BETTER BE CAREFUL

An inkling comes to us from Washington that certain Members of Congress are keeping an eagle eye upon the activities of the 50,000 or more members of the various county and township soil-conservation committees in connection with the Supreme Court fight.

This interest is said to be predicated upon the fact that these committee members rendered heroic service in behalf of the Democratic ticket last November, and that Secretary Wallace and the Farm Bureau Federation have come out in support of the President's Supreme Court proposals.

The close relationship between Secretary Wallace, the Farm Bureau, and the personnel of the soil-conservation committees has been the subject of comment over a period of 4 years, ever since the old A. A. A. was first set up.

First "grass roots" reaction to the Supreme Court proposals that reached Congress were quite evidently spontaneous expressions of free-thinking farmers. Lately, it is said, there is such an unanimity of thought and expression in the letters reaching Congress that some of the Members think they can "smell a mouse."

The administration made such a hullabaloo a year ago about the mass-propaganda methods employed by the utilities companies that it might do well to restrain some of its own enthusiastic bureaus if they attempt to step out of the role they were created to perform.

We have no personal knowledge that anything of the sort has been done or attempted, but the lineup and the affiliation are so evident, and the fight is growing so desperate, that it would not be surprising if some enthusiastic persons sought to use the farmers' committees in this way.

We credit farmers generally with having enough good sense and independence of thought not to permit themselves to be used as the unwitting agents of either an administration or an anti-administration scheme. We also know that 50,000 paid agents of the Government could, if they wished, make enough noise to sound like 500,000—and the "boys" have their jobs at stake, or they think they have.

And so it might be well for the committee members to think twice before engaging in propaganda work, lest some Senator get a bee in his bonnet and call for a Senate investigation of their activities. In the heat of such an intense battle as now is raging in Washington that could happen.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, in connection with the different types of propaganda relating to the reform of the Supreme Court, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter written by Frank E. Gannett. I ask that this letter be printed in the RECORD in view of the matter which the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has placed in the RECORD, as well as the matter which was placed in the RECORD by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE].

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE GANNETT NEWSPAPERS,
Rochester, N. Y., February 13, 1937.

Dr. JOHN R. HAYNES,
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR DR. HAYNES: "There is no liberty if the power of judging be not separated from the legislative and executive powers."

This was said while adoption of our Constitution was under discussion.

Today this principle is attacked and in danger, although its vital truth is as self-evident now as then. Life tenure was assured to judges because the founders of this Government knew that to preserve government under law independence of the judiciary is indispensable.

The fight to protect our Supreme Court from subordination to the Executive can be won. It requires organization, national and local; immediate aggressive action and enough money to carry the cost of awakening public opinion. I have joined with others in organizing a national nonpartisan, nonpolitical committee to carry on this fight.

1. Will you sign and circulate the attached petition?

2. Will you volunteer to help organize a nonpartisan local committee to cooperate with us in your own congressional district? The outcome in Congress will depend upon how well and quickly public opinion is mobilized in every congressional district and State. Will you protest to your Senators and Congressmen at once, sending me a copy?

3. Will you make a contribution to help carry the expenses of a national organization?

Prompt mass action is essential. Please show this letter to friends and business associates. Enlist their cooperation with yours.

Please write me your suggestions and viewpoint and also return the enclosed blank by earliest mail.

Yours sincerely,

FRANK E. GANNETT.

SUGAR-QUOTA SYSTEM (H. DOC. NO. 156)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

The expiration on December 31, 1937, of the quota provisions of the Jones-Costigan Act and Public Resolution No. 109, of June 19, 1936, and the existence of the public problems which have arisen as a result of discontinuance of the processing tax on sugar and benefit payments to sugar-beet and sugarcane producers, make it desirable that the Congress consider the enactment of new legislation with respect to sugar. The Jones-Costigan Act has been useful and effective and it is my belief that its principles should again be made effective.

I therefore recommend to the Congress the enactment of the sugar-quota system and its necessary complements, which will restore the operation of the principles on which the Jones-Costigan Act was based. In order to accomplish this purpose adequate safeguards would be required to protect the interests of each group concerned. As a safeguard for the protection of consumers, I recommend that provision be made to prevent any possible restriction of the supply of sugar that would result in prices to consumers in excess of those reasonably necessary, together with conditional payments to producers, to maintain the domestic industry as a whole and to make the production of sugar beets and sugarcane as profitable as the production of the principal other agricultural crops. In order to protect the expansion of markets for American exports, I recommend that no decrease be made in the share of other countries in the total quotas.

It is also highly desirable to continue the policy, which was inherent in the Jones-Costigan Act, of effectuating the principle that an industry which desires the protection afforded by a quota system or a tariff should be expected to guarantee that it will be a good employer. I recommend, therefore, that the prevention of child labor and the payment of wages of not less than minimum standards be included among the conditions for receiving a Federal payment.

I recommend that adequate provision be made to protect the right of both new and old producers of small acreages of sugar beets and sugarcane to an equitable share of the benefits offered by the program. In this connection I suggest also that you consider the advisability of providing for payments at rates for family size farms higher than those applicable to large operating units.

Quotas influence the price of sugar through the control of supply, consequently under a quota regulation of the supply of sugar a tax may be levied without causing any adverse effect, over a period of time, on the price paid by consumers.

I recommend to the Congress the enactment of an excise tax at the rate of not less than 0.75 cent per pound of sugar, raw value. I am definitely advised that such a tax would not increase the average cost of sugar to consumers. An excise tax of this amount would yield approximately $100,000,000 per annum to the Treasury of the United States, which would make the total revenue from sugar more nearly commensurate with that obtained during the period 1922–29. It is also estimated that the total income of foreign countries from the sale of sugar in the United States under the quota system would not be less than that obtained during 1935, and, like the total income of domestic-sugar producers, it can be expected to increase in future years as our consumption requirements expand.

In considering the enactment of any tax the Congress has regard for its social and economic effects as well as its ability to raise revenue. The social and economic effects of an adequate excise tax on sugar are so important to the welfare of the various groups affected as to constitute a necessary complement to the quota system. For this reason I recommend that neither the quotas nor the tax should be operative alone.

PROPOSED CHILD-LABOR AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Governor of New Mexico, transmitting a joint resolution of the Legislature of that State, ratifying the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, empowering the Congress to limit, regulate, and to prohibit the labor of persons under 18 years of age, which, with the accompanying resolution, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF NEW MEXICO,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Santa Fe, February 23, 1937.

Hon. JOHN GARNER,
President of the Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GARNER: Pursuant to the resolution of the Thirteenth Legislature of the State of New Mexico, I am enclosing herewith signed copy of House Joint Resolution No. 4, introduced by Mrs. Luella McGaffey-Brown, Mrs. George Ringler, and Mrs. Charles R. Love, entitled "Ratifying the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, empowering the Congress to limit, regulate, and prohibit the labor of persons under 18 years of age."

Yours very truly,

CLYDE TINGLEY,
Governor of New Mexico.

[Enclosure]

House joint resolution ratifying the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States empowering the Congress to limit, regulate, and prohibit the labor of persons under 18 years of age

Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of New Mexico:

Whereas at the first session of the Sixty-eighth Congress of the United States it was resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives in Congress assembled that the following article be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, shall be valid to all interests and purposes as a part of said Constitution, namely:

"SECTION 1. The Congress shall have power to limit, regulate, and prohibit the labor of all persons under 18 years of age.

"SEC. 2. The power of the several States is unimpaired by this article except that the operation of State laws shall be suspended to the extent necessary to give effect to legislation enacted by the Congress."

Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of New Mexico does hereby ratify the above-recited proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions and preamble to the Secretary of State of the United States; to the Presiding Officer of the United States Senate; to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

ALVAN N. WHITE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Attest:

GEORGE W. ARMIJO,
Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives.

———,
President of the Senate.

Attest:

EVA ELLEN SABIN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

Approved by me this 23d day of February 1937.

CLYDE TINGLEY,
Governor of New Mexico.

DRAFTS OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION BY THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate several letters from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, which, with the accompanying papers, were referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, as follows:

A letter transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to provide for the addition or additions of certain lands to the Fort Donelson National Military Park in the State of Tennessee, and for other purposes;

A letter transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the exercise of sole and exclusive jurisdiction by the United States over the Hawaii National Park in the Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes", approved April 19, 1930; and

A letter transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend an act entitled "An act extending the homestead laws and providing for right-of-way for railroads in the District of Alaska, and for other purposes", approved May 14, 1898 (30 Stat. 409, 414).

COURT ORDERS RESTRAINING ENFORCEMENT OF LAWS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate letters from the Secretary of Labor and the Assistant Administrator of the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, respectively, submitting the information requested by Senate Resolution 82 (agreed on the 17th ultimo), calling for certain information concerning injunctions or judgments issued or rendered by Federal courts since March 4, 1933, in cases involving acts of Congress, which, with the accompanying statement transmitted by the Assistant Administrator of Public Works, were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PERSHING HALL

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from Julian M. Thomas, Esq., counsel for the American Legion Building, Paris, Inc., transmitting a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the American Legion Building, Inc. (a Delaware corporation), former owner of Pershing Hall, Paris, France, favoring recognition by the Government of certain existing commitments in connection with the transfer of title of Pershing Hall to the Government of the United States, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Senate Joint Memorial 6

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Thirty-ninth Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon convened in regular session, respectfully request and petition as follows:

Whereas the white-pine blister rust was imported from Europe to the New England States, from which point it has spread to Idaho, Washington, California, and to Oregon; and

Whereas the white-pine blister rust, if uncontrolled, will kill all five-needle pines, including sugar pine, which is the most important timber species in many Oregon counties; and

Whereas the loss of sugar pine will mean the loss of employment for thousands of men now engaged in lumbering operations in Oregon, and heavy loss in assessed values of the counties: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Oregon (the house of representatives jointly concurring therein), That we, your memorialists, the Thirty-ninth Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, respectfully petition the Congress of the United States and the Secretary of Agriculture and the Chief of the Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine that Federal funds that are now or which hereafter are made available for the control of white-pine blister rust be expended on private and State-owned timberlands as well as upon timberlands owned by the Federal Government; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be transmitted to the President of the United States, to the President of the United States Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the Secretary of Agriculture, to the Chief of the Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine, and to each member of the delegation in Congress from the State of Oregon, and that the secretary of state of the State of Oregon hereby is instructed to transmit the same.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Senate Joint Memorial No. 5

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Thirty-ninth Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon in regular session assembled, respectfully request and petition as follows:

Whereas the Columbia River heretofore has been the source of the largest supply of salmon in the United States; and

Whereas the average annual pack of salmon on the Columbia River now is approximately $10,000,000; and

Whereas thousands of workers and inhabitants of the Northwest are dependent on the salmon industry for a living; and

Whereas the United States Government has erected and is erecting large dams at Grand Coulee, Bonneville, and Rock Island, and has constructed a number of irrigation projects and such dams and irrigation systems act as a barrier and a menace to the salmon in proceeding to or attempting to gain the spawning grounds; and

Whereas it is absolutely necessary that salmon be permitted to proceed to their natural spawning grounds or that artificial progation be immediately greatly increased in order to preserve the annual production of salmon; and

Whereas the action of the United States in building such dams and other projects on the Columbia River is about to destroy the salmon industry on and along the Columbia River and its tributaries: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Oregon (the house of representatives jointly concurring therein), That your memorialists, the Thirty-ninth Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, do hereby respectfully request and petition the Congress of the United States to make an immediate appropriation of not less than $500,000, payable one-half to the fish commission of the State of Oregon and one-half to the bureau of fisheries of the State of Washington, the same to be expended by the States of Oregon and Washington for the purpose of building fish hatcheries above and below the Bonneville Dam, and for the purpose of promoting in other necessary ways the artificial propagation of salmon in order to replace in some measure the damage occasioned to the industry by the barriers placed in the Columbia River by the United States Government; and be it further

Resolved, That an additional annual appropriation of $150,000 to each State also be provided in order to properly maintain such hatcheries; and be it further

Resolved, That your memorialists most respectfully urge that such appropriation be made immediately, as every delay results in a further destruction of salmon, and if delayed too long will result in a total extinction of this fish on the Columbia River, as it has become extinct in other streams and rivers simply for lack of funds to provide artificial propagation; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this joint memorial be forwarded by the chief clerk of the senate to the President of the United States, to both Houses of Congress of the United States, and to each Member of the Oregon delegation in Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

To the Honorable Congress of the United States; to Hon. Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior; and Hon. Anthony J. Dimond, Delegate to Congress from Alaska:

Your memorialist, the Legislature of Alaska, respectfully represents:

That there was passed by the Congress of the United States and approved June 30, 1932, an act governing the operation of roads, trails, and bridges in Alaska, found in section 321b, title 48, United States Code, and also section 3, 47 Statutes at Large, page 446, and which act gives the Secretary of the Interior the power, by order or regulation, to make rules and regulations governing the use of roads, trails, and other works in Alaska, including the fixing and collection of tolls where deemed necessary and advisable in the public interests; and

Whereas, pursuant to the power and authority vested in him by virtue of the act aforesaid, the Honorable Secretary of the Interior, by order no. 905, dated March 25, 1935, has promulgated a set of regulations for the use of highways in Alaska and the operation of motor vehicles, section 2 of which regulations reads as follows:

"2. Tolls: For the transportation of merchandise or freight over the Richardson Highway there shall be charged and collected at or adjacent to the McCarty Ferry on the Tanana River, tolls equal to 2½ cents per ton of such merchandise or freight passing that point, multiplied by the number of miles such merchandise or freight has been or is being carried over the said highway. No vehicle hauling such merchandise or freight shall be allowed to pass the designated toll station except upon payment of the tolls as herein provided. It shall be the duty of the Governor of Alaska, as ex-officio Commissioner for the Interior Department, to cause the collection of the tolls to be made in such manner as may be found most convenient and practicable, and all moneys so collected shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts"; and

Whereas the imposition of said tolls upon the Richardson Highway between Valdez and Fairbanks, and between other points on said highway, has worked a great hardship upon the residents of Fairbanks and interior Alaska by adding to the freight rates normally required a toll of approximately $8 per ton on all freight shipped over the Richardson Highway from Valdez to Fairbanks, Alaska; and

Whereas said rate is discriminatory and unjust and adds to the cost and expense of doing business and to the cost of living of all the people in Fairbanks and other points in the interior of Alaska:

Now, therefore, your memorialist respectfully prays that section 321b, title 48, United States Code; section 3, 47 Statutes at Large, page 446, providing that tolls may be fixed and collected on highways in Alaska, be repealed; and, pending such repeal, that the Honorable Secretary of the Interior be requested to suspend the operation of the regulation contained in order no. 905 requiring tolls to be paid for transportation of merchandise or freight over the Richardson Highway.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States and the Honorable Secretary of the Department of the Interior:

Your memorialist, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, in regular session assembled, respectfully represents:

That the Government of the United States has expended more than $50,000,000 in the construction of a railway from Seward to Fairbanks, Alaska; and

That the railway was expected to serve as an arterial transportation unit to derive its revenue from so-called feeder highways originating at the railway tracks; and

That it was known and believed at the time the railway was constructed that large areas of undeveloped mineral lands existed within the convenient reach of said railway; and

That it was contemplated at that time to build highways tributary to said railway to encourage the development of the resources and justify the construction of said railway; and

That the Government of the United States subsequently established a farm colony at Palmer on said railway for the purpose of developing the arable lands in that vicinity and establishing a permanent population along said railway; and

That said colony is a success and will prove to be a credit to Alaska and evidence of the wisdom of Congress; and

That the future prosperity of said colony is directly dependent upon more people to consume its products; and

That those people must of necessity be those who are engaged in other industries, rather than those who may till the soil and become at least independent of the Palmer colonists if not actually competitors; and

That such other industries are restricted to the development of the mineral lands together with the incidental and related activities; and

That the area east of the Matanuska Valley, for a distance of 150 miles, is known to be favorable for gold and other metalliferous deposits; and

That the area is now inaccessible from the railway for any kind of vehicular traffic; and

That a road from the Matanuska Government colony at Palmer to Copper Center on the Richardson Highway would pass directly through the area referred to and open it up to miners and prospectors; and

That the miners and prospectors would contribute toward the prosperity of the colony at Palmer and to the railway and its other communities; and

That there are no unusual or insuperable conditions existing that would render highway construction either difficult or expensive:

Now, therefore, your memorialist, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, respectfully urges that immediate steps be taken toward the construction of said highway.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Whereas the Congress of the United States has enacted an act known as the Bankhead-Jones Act, and enacted on the 29th day of June 1935, being Public No. 182, Seventy-fourth Congress; and

Whereas the purpose of the act is to furnish funds to facilitate research into the basic laws and principles relating to agriculture, and to provide for the further development of cooperative agricultural extension work and the more complete endowment and support of land-grant colleges; and

Whereas the provisions of the act make available to the several States and Territories certain funds subject to the assent of the States and Territories; and

Whereas the State of Minnesota, in order to avail itself of its proportions of the funds, desires to assent to the provisions of the act: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Minnesota (the house of representatives concurring), That the State of Minnesota does assent to the provisions of the said Bankhead-Jones Act, and the assent is hereby given, and that the secretary of state is hereby directed to send certified copies of this resolution to the Honorable John N. Garner, President of the Senate of the United States, and Hon. William B. Bankhead, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and two copies to the Secretary of Agriculture, Henry A. Wallace.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States and the President of the United States of the dangers possible and probable in the livestock industry from revision of the sanitary covenants with certain foreign countries

Whereas livestock and livestock products produced by the American farmer represents more than half of the annual income of the American farmer; and

Whereas the present Secretary of Agriculture when he assumed office stated that our cattle population exceeded our domestic demand by over 1,000,000 head; and

Whereas the duty of 6 cents per pound now existing on importations of beef does not adequately prevent its importation, due to the extremely low cost of production in South American countries; and

Whereas sanitary covenants existing with certain foreign nations, due to the existence of foot-and-mouth disease, have prevented the importations of animals from those countries and have so far benefited the American farmers in keeping out that most dreaded disease to cattle; and

Whereas any relaxation of any of our national sanitary laws that would admit in the slightest degree any importation of livestock or livestock meat products from Argentina or any other country infested with foot-and-mouth disease, the most dreaded and feared disease known to veterinary science, from which the economic loss is terrific; and

Whereas there is now before the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate for ratification a convention agreement between the United States of America and the Republic of Argentina, with reference to sanitary regulations concerning plant and animal products and if recommended and passed will result in the greatest disaster to the livestock industry ever experienced in this country by jeopardizing the health of our breeding herds and flocks: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the State of Minnesota, and the House of Representatives concurred here, that we hereby respectfully petition the Senate of the United States and urge the President of the United States to refrain from the relaxation of the sanitary requirements by means of covenant and otherwise with countries where it is known that foot-and-mouth disease exists; it is therefore

Resolved, That the secretary of the State of Minnesota is hereby instructed to forward a copy of this resolution to the President of the Senate of the United States, to the members of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate of the United States, and to the President of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Nevada, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Assembly joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States and the Resettlement Administration to provide adequate credit for restocking ranches in Nevada and other Western States, so as to restore their earning powers and land values, with the rate of interest on such loans reduced to the minimum

Whereas the stock ranches in Nevada and other Western States, comprising the livestock area of the Western States, have suffered a decided depreciation in the livestock therein; and

Whereas farming in these States is largely incidental to the livestock business, requiring an adequate livestock population in order to maintain the farms, without which farming in this area is doomed to bankruptcy: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of Nevada, That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to provide, through the Resettlement Administration, adequate credit for restocking farms and ranches in Nevada and other Western States at a minimum rate of interest; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of these resolutions be transmitted to the President of the Senate of the United States and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and that copies thereof be transmitted to each of our Senators in the United States Senate, to our Representative in Congress, and to the Resettlement Administration at Washington, D. C.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota (the house of representatives concurring therein)—

Whereas there has been introduced in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, H. R. 1668, known as the Pettengill fourth-section bill, providing for repeal of the long-and-short-haul clause of the fourth section of the Interstate Commerce Act; and

Whereas the repeal of the long-and-short-haul clause would permit railroad companies to assess lower rates and charges for long hauls than for shorter hauls over the same route; and

Whereas the charging of a higher rate for a short haul than for a longer haul, the shorter being included within the longer, is now forbidden on North Dakota intrastate traffic in section 4720, Compiled Laws of North Dakota for the year 1913; and

Whereas the passage of this bill would result in increased freight rates and charges on articles moving in interstate commerce to and from North Dakota, particularly on grain, lignite, and other commodities, to the detriment of producers, shippers, and consumers of the State of North Dakota; that it would encourage discriminations in rates against small shippers in favor of large shippers that would be against the public interest, and would, we believe, be in the end detrimental to the best interests of the railroads themselves: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate of this twenty-fifth legislative assembly (the house of representatives concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States is hereby respectfully memorialized and urged to deny the passage of H. R. 1668 when, as, and if presented for its consideration; be it further

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives of the State of North Dakota in the Congress of the United States be requested to put forth every honorable effort to defeat this bill upon presentation to the Congress of the United States, and that copies of this memorial be forwarded forthwith to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to the Senators and Representatives of the State of North Dakota.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Indiana, favoring the enactment of legislation to continue the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works and to make the necessary appropriations therefor, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

(See concurrent resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. VAN NUYS on Feb. 26, 1937, p. 1641, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Middlesborough (Ky.) Rotary Club, favoring the adoption of a comprehensive flood-control program in the Ohio Basin, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Tennessee, praying for the enactment of legislation for the relief of citizens in the flood-stricken areas of western Tennessee, especially in Dyer, Lake, and Lauderdale Counties, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Council of the City of Cleveland, Ohio, favoring the enactment of adequate antilynching legislation, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the mayor and Board of Aldermen of the City of Natchez, Miss., favoring the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judiciary and to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by District Lodge, No. 34, International Association of Machinists, of Cincinnati, Ohio, and the Detroit Democratic Club, of Detroit, Mich., favoring the prompt enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by Lodge No. 416, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Ennis, Tex., and Firestone Lodge, No. 7, United Rubber Workers of America, of Akron, Ohio, favoring the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Oswego County (N. Y.) Bar Association, protesting against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate the memorial of members of the Preachers' Meeting of the Washington District of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Washington, D. C. (signed by its president and secretary), remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MURRAY presented a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana, favoring the enactment of legislation for the creation and establishment of the so-called Townsend recovery plan, and for benefits to be paid to all persons over the age of 60 years, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LODGE presented 20 memorials, numerously signed by sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented two memorials of sundry citizens of Lowell and Worcester, Mass., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VANDENBERG presented a resolution adopted by the Forest Grange of Mecosta County, Mich., protesting against the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, especially the proposal to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Bar Associations of Bay, Ingham, and Jackson Counties, Mich., protesting against the enactment of proposed legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Calhoun County (Mich.) Bar Association, favoring the enactment of certain proposed legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, and opposing the enactment of other legislation pertaining to the subject, especially the proposal to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LONERGAN presented a resolution adopted by a town meeting of citizens of Easton, Conn., which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it resolved, That we, the voters of the town of Easton, peaceably assembled at a town meeting do hereby express our disapproval of the action of the President of the United States in requesting Congress to give him authority to increase the Supreme Court of the United States by appointing six additional Supreme Court Judges, thereby depriving us of our liberties obtained for us by our founding forefathers; be it further

Resolved, That pursuant to the foregoing motion, we, the voters of the town of Easton peaceably assembled at a town meeting direct our town clerk to file the foregoing petition for the redress of our grievances as outlined with Congress, our President, our Senators, and Congressmen in accordance with article 1 of the Bill of Rights as contained in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. WAGNER presented a resolution adopted by members of Local Union No. 301 (New York), United Electrical and Radio Workers of America, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, as follows:

Whereas millions of workingmen are today engaged in carrying out their constitutional rights of free assembly, speech, press, and organization, for the purposes of collective bargaining; and

Whereas the tremendous corporations which employ these millions of workingmen have conducted and are conducting a policy of stifling these constitutional rights through espionage, coercion, and the employment of strikebreakers, stool pigeons, operatives, and the like; and

Whereas the United States Senate, through its subcommittee of the Committee on Education and Labor, is conducting an investigation into the unlawful activities of these corporations; and

Whereas the splendid work of this subcommittee, known as the La Follette committee, is in danger of being discontinued because of lack of funds: Be it

Resolved, That the 6,000 members of Local No. 301 of the United Electrical and Radio Workers of America demand that you, as a duly elected Member of the United States Senate or House for the State of New York, work toward and vote for a substantial appropriation to facilitate the further work of the La Follette committee.

Mr. WAGNER also presented a resolution adopted by the advisory committee of the Long Island Cooperative Egg Auction, Inc., Central Islip, N. Y., which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the spread between prices of feed and prices of eggs and poultry is of vital importance to poultry farmers; and

Whereas we believe that the present plight of our poultry farmers is due in a large measure to the relationship between feed costs and returns on poultry products: Be it

Resolved, That we, the advisory committee of the Long Island Cooperative Egg Auction, Inc., representing 750 poultrymen on Long Island, wholeheartedly recommend that the existing tariff on corn be reduced until the present emergency is past.

Mr. WAGNER also presented a resolution adopted by American Legion Philippines Post, No. 1164, Brooklyn, N. Y., which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Navy Department have been authorized by the President and the Congress of the United States for the construction of two new battleships is now before the Secretary of the Navy for consideration; and

Whereas the allotment of one of these ships to the Brooklyn Navy Yard will be of great benefit to the unemployment situation in the city of Brooklyn, by giving the navy-yard workers an active part in the naval construction program of the Navy Department in order that a steady employment may be maintained: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Philippines Post, No. 1164, American Legion, in regular meeting duly held on Sunday afternoon, February 21, 1937, at 308 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, N. Y., go on record as strongly in favor of the construction of one of these ships at the Brooklyn Navy Yard; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, to Senator COPELAND, to Senator WAGNER, and to the Secretary of the Navy, with the hope that a policy of more in keeping with their duty to the welfare of our citizens and consequently with the maintenance of steady employment of those who are now employed by the navy yard may be kept securely as a necessary measure to remedy the present condition of unemployment.

ARGENTINE SANITARY CONVENTION

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I received today from Hon. Frank J. Ryan, secretary of state of Kansas, a copy of House Concurrent Resolution No. 13, adopted by the Kansas Legislature, memorializing the Senate to refuse ratification of the Argentine Sanitary Convention. I have expressed my opposition to ratification of this convention several times on the floor of the Senate and shall continue to oppose it. The effect of it would be to let down the bars to imports of livestock and fresh meat from the Argentine, now under quarantine because of the prevalence of foot-and-mouth disease in that nation. I ask that the resolution be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

The concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 13

Concurrent resolution memorializing the Senate of the United States to oppose ratification of the Argentine sanitary agreement which is intended to modify existing regulations on imports of livestock and meats from South American countries where foot-and-mouth disease exist or where the disease has not been uncommon

Whereas since livestock producers in the United States are mindful of the havoc created by and the widespread destruction resulting from the recent California outbreak and the Texas outbreak in 1924–25 and the 1914 outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease infesting 21 States and the District of Columbia; and

Whereas since the only dependable safeguards from outbreaks of the disease in this country are the maintenance of rigid sanitary restrictions and a continuance of present embargoes prohibiting imports of live animals or dressed meats from countries where that disease is known to exist or from countries adjacent to territory where the disease is known to exist: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Kansas (the senate concurring therein), That these bodies hereby vigorously oppose any modification of the existing Federal laws governing the movement of livestock or livestock products from any foreign country harboring foot-and-mouth disease or any other transmissible disease of livestock which does not now exist in the United States, or from any foreign country which accepts foot-and-mouth disease merely as an inevitable inconvenience and which makes no serious or determined effort to combat it; be it further

Resolved, In order that the livestock industry of the United States may be protected from hazards resulting from the introduction of foot-and-mouth disease into this country, the Senate of the United States be, and is hereby, urged to oppose ratification of the Argentine sanitary agreement; be it

Resolved further, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and to the several members of said bodies representing this State therein, and to the President of the United States, and to the legislatures of the various States now in session.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. TYDINGS, from the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1095) to provide a government for American Samoa, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 138) thereon.

Mr. COPELAND, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2503) to extend the time for completing the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River near The Dalles, Oreg., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 139) thereon.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Commerce, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

H. R. 194. A bill to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Brownville, Nebr. (Rept. No. 140);

H. R. 3675. A bill to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Savannah River at or near Lincolnton, Ga. (Rept. No. 141); and

H. R. 3148. A bill granting the consent of Congress to the State of Alabama, or Etowah County, or both, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Coosa River at or near Gilberts Ferry, in Etowah County, Ala. (Rept. No. 142).

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BARKLEY:

A bill (S. 1737) granting an increase of pension to Katherine C. Feland; to the Committee on Pensions.

ACCOUNT OF STATE OF VERMONT—REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senate Joint Resolution 21, directing the Comptroller General to readjust the account between the United States and the State of Vermont, being Order of Business No. 28 on the calendar, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

FINANCING AND MANAGEMENT OF RAILROADS—LIMIT OF EXPENDITURE

Mr. WHEELER submitted a resolution (S. Res. 86), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce; and subsequently from that committee he reported the resolution without amendment, and it was referred to the Committee to Audit and control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That there is hereby authorized to be expended from the contingent fund of the Senate for the continuance during the fiscal year 1937 of the investigation authorized by Senate Resolution No. 71, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session, as supplemented by Senate Resolution No. 227, Seventy-fourth Congress, second session, $150,000 in addition to the amounts heretofore authorized for said investigation: Provided, That any balance remaining unexpended on June 30, 1937, under this authorization shall continue to be available for the expenses of the said investigation during the fiscal year 1938.

EXTENSION OF AUTHORITY TO NEGOTIATE TRADE AGREEMENTS—PRINTING OF HEARINGS

Mr. HARRISON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 87), which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That, in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the Printing Act, approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Finance of the Senate be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed 1,000 additional copies of the hearings held before said committee during the first session of the Seventy-fifth Congress on the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 96) entitled "Joint resolution to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Megill, one of its clerks, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. HENRY E. STUBBS, late a Representative from the State of California, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

The message announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 84) to authorize the Postmaster General to withhold the awarding of star-route contracts for a period of 60 days, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, and they were signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 2518. An act to provide for retirement of Justices of the Supreme Court; and

H. J. Res. 96. Joint resolution to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

AMERICAN NEUTRALITY

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 51) to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war", approved August 31, 1935, being Public Resolution No. 67, Seventy-fourth Congress (S. J. Res. 173), as amended by joint resolution approved February 29, 1936, entitled "Joint resolution extending and amending the joint resolution (Public Res. 67, 74th Cong.) approved August 31, 1935."

PEACE AND NEUTRALITY ACT

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I dislike very much to interfere in any domestic war in considering a bill that is intended to keep us out of foreign wars. I realize, however, that war, whether foreign or domestic, is far more interesting than peace. Therefore, I apologize for interfering in any way whatever with the domestic political war that is going on in this country and in the Senate.

I am satisfied, however, that there will be no need for particular hurry in conducting that fight. I think possibly it will last a long time. I hope no one will be killed in connection with it. I do not believe we shall lose the lives of as many persons as we lost by submarine warfare in the World War. There may be some who will be killed politically, but I do not think anyone will be physically injured.

I hope, therefore, that we may be peace-minded possibly for a day or 2 days while the Senate is considering what is, in my opinion, the most important peace legislation that has ever been submitted to this body.

Having presented on behalf of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States a report recommending the enactment of Senate Joint Resolution No. 51, and the matter now being before the Senate for consideration, I feel it my duty briefly to discuss the provisions of this joint resolution and its effect.

The committee deemed it advisable to include in one amendment the existing so-called neutrality law and the amendments approved by the committee. This process of amendment, if and when the amendment is adopted, will then in one act contain the entire law relative to the subject. It will then be unnecessary to follow the original act through its various amendments in determining the existing law at the time of the examination of our statutes at some future date. This procedure in considering the proposed act certainly expedites its consideration and the determination of its effect.

Without hesitation, and at the very start, I admit that the amendment proposes an entire new peace policy for our Government. It goes beyond any legislation ever adopted in this or any other country; and yet I contend that nothing in this proposed legislation prevents free commerce with the world, except as we have heretofore restricted it in existing law, or is discriminatory, unneutral, or constitutes a surrender of the freedom of the seas. The resolution reenacts the existing law providing for an embargo against the export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war to any belligerents. This act has already been construed by the State Department, and the construction has been adopted and proclaimed by the President of the United States.

When such construction was under consideration by the President, at the time he was considering putting into effect such embargo act as against Italy and Ethiopia during the recent war between those foreign states, he called upon the State Department for a construction of the act as to what was included in the definition of "arms, ammunition, and implements of war." The State Department advised the President that from the procedure before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, and from the discussion on the floor of the Senate prior to the adoption of the act, it was clear that it was the intent of both the committee and the Senate—and therefore of Congress, as the House of Representatives passed such act subsequently to its passage through the Senate—that such definition was intended to include only those articles and materials set out and described in the convention entitled "A convention for the supervision of the international trade in arms and ammunition and in implements of war, signed at Geneva, Switzerland, on June 17, 1925", which convention had been advised and consented to by the United States Senate June 6, 1935, prior to the approval of said embargo act. So the President adopted such construction, and, in his proclamation putting in force such embargo act as to Italy and Ethiopia on the 5th day of October 1935, defined and set out in detail the articles and materials which under the act constitute arms, ammunition, and implements of war as defined and set out in said convention.

I am satisfied that the President will continue to give such definition to the phrase "arms, ammunition, and implements of war." If, however, any Senator is in doubt with regard to this matter, I should personally have no objection to an amendment which would state positively that the definition of arms, ammunition, and implements of war is and shall be the definition given by the President in his said proclamation of October 5, 1935.

The resolution extends the embargo act to foreign states wherein civil strife exists of such a magnitude or conducted in such manner that the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to such states would endanger our peace. It is not intended that such embargo should be applied to foreign states wherein there is insurrection or strife of an insignificant character. The strife must be of such magnitude or conducted in such a manner that the export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war from our country to such foreign state will endanger the peace of the United States; and the President must find such facts to exist, and so proclaim, before such provisions with regard to such state in which civil strife exists go into effect.

I need not argue to the Senate the necessity of vesting such authority in the President. We have already considered and enacted a similar measure with regard to the unfortunate civil strike existing in the state of Spain. Finally, all the major powers have followed our example with regard to such strife in Spain.

The existing law is also amended by declaring that any licenses for the export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war become immediately and ipso facto void as to authority to export such materials to any belligerent countries after the President shall have issued his proclamation as provided in section 1 of the act, designating such belligerent countries. This special provision is for the purpose of putting licensees upon notice.

Section 5 of the existing law, being section 6 of the resolution under consideration, is amended by including armed merchant vessels with submarines in the provision which prescribes that submarines may enter our ports only under such conditions and limitations as the President may prescribe. This control by the President over armed merchant vessels constitutes a new policy for the United States. Under the customs of most nations, including our own, prior to the World War, it was admitted that merchant vessels might be armed for defensive purposes. The advent of the submarine as a new naval craft and a peculiar instrument of naval warfare necessitated further consideration of this subject. A submarine is a frail craft, with a light steel shell. It is capable of being destroyed while on the surface by a single shot from a small cannon mounted upon a merchant ship. The Germans, therefore, during the World War, contended that such guns so mounted on merchant ships were weapons of offense as against submarines, and therefore justified them in treating such vessels as vessels of war.

Mr. Lansing, Secretary of State under President Wilson, in discussing this subject in his note to the Allies on January 18, 1916, said:

> Even a merchant ship carrying a small-caliber gun would be able to use it effectively for defense against a submarine * * *. Consequently the placing of guns on merchantmen at the present day of submarine warfare can be explained only on the ground of a purpose to render merchantmen superior in force to submarines and to prevent warning and visit and search by them. Any armament, therefore, on a merchant vessel would seem to have the character of an offensive armament.

This opinion is concurred in by Prof. John Bassett Moore and other distinguished writers upon international law. Our existing law prohibits the use of our ports and territorial waters by belligerent vessels for the purpose of naval operations. It therefore appears proper that the President be authorized to place upon such armed merchantmen entering our territorial waters such conditions and restrictions as he deems necessary to enforce obedience to our laws.

The existing law with regard to travel by our citizens on the vessels of belligerents has been entirely changed in principle by the pending joint resolution. The existing law provides that our citizens may travel upon belligerent vessels, but only at their own risk. Section 9 of the pending joint resolution makes it unlawful for citizens of the United States to travel at all on belligerent vessels except under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe. It is the policy of Congress, as proposed in this resolution, that our citizens shall not travel upon belligerent vessels except in great emergencies. The President, therefore, will be strict in making exceptions in favor of any citizen, and therefore the act is practically prohibitory.

The chief cause of the loss of lives of our citizens on the high seas prior to our entry into the World War was the travel of American citizens on passenger vessels of warring countries and the destruction of our freight vessels in German war zones by submarines. Take the horrible sinking of the Lusitania as an example. It was a British merchant vessel. It was carrying munitions of war to Great Britain. It was prepared to act as an offensive vessel of war. It was sunk by a German submarine on May 7, 1915, in the established German war zone off the coast of Ireland.

In that frightful catastrophe 128 innocent, peaceful, happy citizens of the United States met terrible death. There was no excuse for our citizens being upon that British vessel. This was nearly a year after the World War had commenced. There was no legitimate excuse for our citizens traveling as passengers on any belligerent ships. They not alone endangered their own lives but endangered the peace of this country, as the loss of the lives of our citizens inflamed the minds of the people of our country to the point of war. Their excitement and their resentment ended in war. President Wilson, in his war message said:

> I am not now thinking of the loss of property involved, immense and serious as that is, but only of the wanton and wholesale destruction of the lives of noncombatants, men, women, and children, engaged in pursuits which have always, even in the darkest periods of modern history, been deemed innocent and legitimate. Property can be paid for; the lives of peaceful and innocent people cannot be.

We had no law at that time to prohibit American citizens from traveling on belligerent vessels.

And after we were shocked again and again by the destruction of the lives of more of our citizens traveling on belligerent vessels. It was these murders of our citizens that our Government and our people most condemned and which inflamed the minds of our people for war. It was this destruction of the lives of our citizens that was one of the chief causes that dragged us into that terrible and futile war. The President so announced in his war message. I do not admit that this was the only cause for our entering the World War, because, unhappily, the German Government, through its Embassy in our country and through its officers enjoying privileges and immunities and while the guests of our Government, and while peace existed between the United States and Germany, sought a conspiracy with Mexico, our neighbor, and Japan, both friendly countries, to join Germany in war against us, when Germany became engaged in war with the United States, which it expected and for which it was preparing.

It is admitted that such travel by our citizens upon belligerent vessels was not a violation of neutrality nor of any law. Surely, however, this reasonable restriction upon our citizens by their own Government and for their own safety, and for the protection of the peace of our country, cannot be seriously urged as a surrender of any freedom of the seas.

I have now discussed all of the material amendments to the existing law. There are three entirely new provisions in the pending resolution which places restrictions upon our citizens and our commerce with relation to belligerents. These three provisions establish a new peace policy for the United States. I will not deal with these provisions in the order in which they appear in the resolution, but in a manner that I consider a better sequence in this debate.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, does the Senator from Nevada wish to complete his general statement before yielding to interruptions? There is one amendment to the existing law the meaning of which I should like to ascertain. If the Senator, before he proceeds with his statement as to the amendment of existing law, would answer a question as to that amendment I should like to know what is its meaning. I refer to the first section of the bill in its present form. There has been eliminated this language:

> * * * to any port of such belligerent states, or to any neutral port for transshipment to, or for the use of, a belligerent country.

The language substituted for that is—> * * * to any such belligerent state, or to any neutral state for transshipment to, or for the use of, a belligerent state.

It may not be material, but I was anxious to know why that language had been changed.

Mr. PITTMAN. I should prefer to go into that later on, because I am only making this statement so that there may be a consecutive discussion of what is in the measure, and I am sure that if I get off the line by entering into a discussion of the matter referred to by the Senator from North Dakota I would be, perhaps, too long on that phase of the subject.

Mr. NYE. Very well.

Mr. PITTMAN. Section 10 of the pending resolution prohibits the arming of American merchant vessels engaged in commerce with belligerents. This is a new provision and adopts a new policy in the aid of the preservation of peace and the protection of the lives of our citizens. I deem this, next to the provision prohibiting travel by American citizens on belligerent vessels, the most important provision to be contained in the act.

Under modern naval warfare, as exemplified during the World War, and which we have no reason to believe will not be so conducted in the next world war, no merchant vessel was safe from sinking without notice by a submarine, whether such vessel carried contraband or noncontraband. This applies to neutral vessels as well as to belligerent vessels. Prior to the World War there was one international custom—sometimes called international law—which was universally respected. That was the rule with regard to visit and search. Ships of war of belligerents under such rule were permitted peacefully to visit and search a merchant vessel to ascertain its destination and to determine whether it was transporting contraband of war to the enemy.

This procedure of visit and search was always conducted in a peaceful manner without injury to the ship or those on board, unless the ship attempted to escape or to resist. If contraband cargo was found on board it could be confiscated. No neutral vessel could be sunk except in the event of attempted escape or resistance. In other cases where it was permitted to sink a vessel the rules strictly provided that such merchant vessel could not be sunk until the safety of those on board was provided for.

With the use of submarines during the World War as new and unusual instruments of naval warfare the situation changed. The seas were controlled by the surface war vessels of Great Britain and her allies. Germany possessed only one type of war vessel that was capable of preventing contraband cargoes from reaching her enemies. This was the submarine.

Germany contended that her submarines could not follow the humane rule of visit and search because she asserted that such customary visit and search would require a submarine to come to the surface, stop the merchant vessel, and place officers aboard for the purpose of determining whether the vessel was carrying contraband; and the submarine upon the surface could be sunk with one shot of a small cannon. She asserted that the merchant vessels of her enemies were so armed, and that by reason of the misuse of neutral flags by such enemies she was unable to distinguish between neutral ships and belligerent ships. Unfortunately these assertions were true.

In reply to these arguments on behalf of the German Government the United States Government called upon that Government to cease submarine attacks against merchant ships, since they could not be made according to the accepted rules of humane naval warfare. To this Germany retorted that her enemy, Great Britain, was resorting to every method to cut off from Germany the necessities of life through the violation of the accepted customs of naval warfare, particularly with regard to the establishment of paper blockades under the designation of "military areas" and the illegal seizure of cargoes upon neutral ships. She contended therefore that it was essential and justifiable for her to retaliate against her enemies.

Again, unfortunately, the charges made by Germany against Great Britain were true. Great Britain, on the other hand, attempted to justify her violation of such accepted customs of naval warfare by charging that Germany also was violating the accepted customs of naval warfare, particularly with regard to visit and search, through the destruction of merchant vessels without notice and without providing for the safety of those on board; and that therefore she—Great Britain—found it necessary to retaliate against Germany.

Our Government protested against the wrongful acts of both governments toward our neutral ships and our neutral commerce. The protests were ignored; the illegal acts continued. Property of American citizens was confiscated and the lives of American citizens taken. This assumed right of retaliation served to set aside what was termed "international law", being those accepted customs of naval warfare by nations generally which time and time again had been confirmed by treaties between various powers.

What remedy did we have? Was there any law that we could impose upon any of the belligerent governments against their will? If so, what law? Was there any court having jurisdiction over such controversies to which the belligerents or the neutrals had agreed to submit such controversies for adjudication and final determination? I know of no such courts nor of any such agreements.

Great Britain, on November 3, 1914, announced:

> They therefore give notice that the whole of the North Sea must be considered a military area. Within this area merchant ships of all kinds, traders of all countries, fishing craft, and other vessels will be exposed to the gravest dangers from mines which it has been necessary to lay and from warships searching vigilantly by night and day for suspicious craft.

Our Government protested to Great Britain against the establishment of this military area, and particularly with regard to strewing the North Sea with powerful and destructive mines without regard to endangering the safety of neutral ships engaged in neutral trade with neutrals. It called to the attention of the British Government the fact that the declaration of The Hague of 1907, which Great Britain and many other governments had ratified, prohibited the use of such mines. Great Britain responded that such convention and declaration was of no force and effect, as it had not been ratified by Russia. Great Britain recognized no international law with regard to the subject and excused herself from the effect of a convention that she, through her representatives, had ratified.

Germany, therefore, contended that she had a right to violate any such rule in retaliation against Great Britain.

So again we have an example of all accepted customs of nations which we may call international law and age-long concepts confirmed in many treaties between various governments which were held subservient to the right of retaliation.

Where was our international law?

Therefore Germany, on January 31, 1917, in retaliation against Great Britain, as she alleged, established a war zone around Great Britain, France, Italy, and the eastern Mediterranean. In giving public notice of the establishment of such zone, she declared:

> Under these circumstances Germany will meet the illegal measures of her enemies by forcefully preventing, after February 1, 1917, in a zone around Great Britain, France, Italy, and the eastern Mediterranean, all navigation, that of neutrals included, from and to England, from and to France, etc. All ships met with in that zone will be sunk.

There was no question of contraband involved here. Any neutral vessel entering the zone with or without its knowledge accidentally or deliberately carrying neutral cargo to a neutral country would be sunk without notice. Of course, our Government protested violently against such brutal proclamation and the inhuman acts that were declared would be committed under it. The same answers were made by Germany. Germany stood on the supreme law of the right of retaliation and so our Government, having no remedy save war, sought to bring about an adjustment between Germany and her enemies so that such destruction might be avoided. On January 7, 1916, Mr. Robert Lansing, Secretary of State, wrote to President Wilson as follows:

> MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I have been thinking over, as I know you have, some means of placing submarine warfare on a basis which will prevent the horrors which have characterized it in the past.
> I think that I appreciate the German point of view in regard to the danger to a submarine in attacking an armed merchant vessel, and have prepared a memorandum on the subject, which I enclose.
> If the argument has merit the method of reaching a settlement on a basis which would safeguard human life would seem to be an agreement by Germany and Austria not to torpedo enemy vessels without putting the people on board in safety, provided they did not continue to flee, in consideration of an agreement by the Entente Powers not to permit their merchant ships to carry an armament.
> I am sure the Teutonic Powers would agree to this, and I cannot see how the Entente Powers could reasonably object to such an arrangement, particularly in view of the fact that there is no case recorded, to my knowledge, of a submarine being destroyed by gunfire from a merchant vessel.
> This plan would be practically a modus vivendi and could be made reciprocal on account of the activities of British submarines in the Baltic.
> Would you advise my attempting to obtain such agreements?
> Faithfully yours,
> ROBERT LANSING.

The President approved of this plan. On January 18 Mr. Lansing addressed identical letters to the British Ambassador and the French, Russian, and Italian Ambassadors and the Belgian Minister. In that letter Mr. Lansing said:

> While I am fully alive to the appalling loss of life among noncombatants, regardless of age or sex, which has resulted from the present method of destroying merchant vessels without removing the persons on board to places of safety, and while I view that practice as contrary to those humane principles which would control belligerents in the conduct of their naval operations, I do not feel that a belligerent should be deprived of the proper use of submarines in the interruption of enemy commerce, since those instruments of war have proved their effectiveness in this particular branch of warfare on the high seas.

Then in his letter he laid down five rules governing the conduct of submarines and merchantmen. I will only quote one other paragraph from these letters which I think discloses the whole proposition. Mr. Lansing says:

> It would, therefore, appear to be a reasonable and reciprocally just arrangement if it could be agreed by the opposing belligerents that submarines should be caused to adhere strictly to the rules of international law in the matter of stopping and searching merchant vessels, determining their belligerent nationality, and removing the crews and passengers to places of safety before sinking the vessels as prizes of war, and that merchant vessels of belligerent nationality should be prohibited and prevented from carrying any armament whatsoever.
> In presenting this formula as a basis for conditional declarations by the belligerent governments, I do so in the full conviction that your government will consider primarily the humane purpose of saving the lives of innocent people rather than the insistence upon a doubtful legal right which may be denied on account of new conditions.

All of the governments so addressed declined to accept or consider such proposals. The President then announced to the world that he intended to stand on our rights under international law. This announcement had no effect upon the situation. The sinking by submarines continued and the violation of all our rights under the accepted customs of nations with regard to naval warfare proceeded with renewed vigor.

On the 13th day of March, 1917, the President proclaimed armed neutrality and ordered the arming of our merchant vessels. This was the gravest mistake that our Government made. It was even a foolish act. A cannon on a merchant ship is no defense against a submerged submarine and only invited attack as was subsequently proven. From the beginning of the war down to the date of the proclamation for the arming of our ships, only seven lives were taken of American citizens by reason of the sinking by submarines of American merchantmen. Between that date and our entry into the war on April 6, 1917, from such cause we lost the lives of 63 citizens. President Wilson, in his war message, recognized the failure of armed neutrality. In that address he said:

> When I addressed the Congress on the 26th of February last I thought that it would suffice to assert our neutral rights with arms, our right to use the seas against unlawful interference, our right to keep our people safe against unlawful violence. But armed neutrality, it now appears, is impracticable. Because submarines are in effect outlaws when used as the German submarines have been used against merchant shipping, it is impossible to defend ships against their attacks, as the law of nations has assumed that merchantmen would defend themselves against privateers or cruisers, visible craft giving chase upon the open sea.

I can conceive of no argument against the adoption of the section of the resolution prohibiting the arming of our merchant ships. While there is grave danger of another world war, and while I expect to see submarines used as commerce destroyers in the next war in the manner they were used in the last, I do not believe that any belligerent country, when they know that our merchant ships are not armed, and that they are so identified otherwise than by the flag that their nationality will be certain, and that they will stop upon demand and submit peaceably to visit and search, will sink our merchant vessels without notice, and without complying with the humane customs of visit, search, and seizure universally accepted by nations. If this is true, then this provision, together with the provision prohibiting American citizens traveling upon belligerent ships, should eliminate the danger of the loss of life of our citizens, and remove the greatest cause that could incite us to war.

I now come to the discussion of subsection (a) of section 2. This subsection grants to the President authority to prohibit American merchant ships from transporting to belligerents articles and materials other than and in addition to arms, ammunition, and implements of war, when he shall find and proclaim that the placing of such restrictions is necessary to promote the security or preserve the peace or neutrality of the United States, or to protect the lives and commerce of nationals of the United States. Such restrictions do not apply until the President has issued his proclamation as to the existence of war, and has named the belligerents. When this has been done, and the restrictions are so placed on our ships, they apply to transportation to all belligerents equally and alike.

Let us keep in mind the fact that the restrictions provided for in subsection (a) of section 2 apply solely to American vessels. The chief object of such restrictions upon American vessels in the event of a widespread war in which we are neutral is to protect the lives of our seamen on American merchantmen transporting freight to belligerents or for transshipment to belligerents. We must look to our experience in the World War in attempting to protect the lives of our citizens in the next world war.

Under the accepted rules of naval warfare prior to the World War, neutral ships on the high seas could be stopped, visited, and searched to ascertain if there was contraband on board; and the belligerent ship, if it found contraband on board, had the right to confiscate that contraband. The belligerent ship, however, had no right to attack the neutral ship unless it attempted to escape or resisted peaceful visit. Even in those cases, under the customary rules of naval warfare, where the belligerent was permitted to sink the ship, it was absolutely necessary that it first provide for the safety of those on board. If that had been the rule pursued during the World War by submarines, there might have been danger of the loss of cargoes, but no danger to the lives of the seamen on board. Unfortunately the German submarines did not abide by the time-immemorial rules of visit, search, and seizure. They not only violated these universally accepted rules but they violated the rules of blockade. Of course, a neutral vessel under the accepted rules was subject to the danger of being sunk if it tried to run a blockade; but a blockade was defined to exist only when a port was invested by an enemy, or the entrance of the port was so commanded by enemy war vessels that a neutral ship could not enter without danger of destruction.

Germany, however, established what she called a war zone, in which any ship entering was considered a trespasser, and subject to being sunk just as though it were running a blockade. This war zone consisted of a line somewhere out upon the high seas surrounding Great Britain, France, Russia, and Italy. No merchant ship could tell when it entered such zone. Its establishment made it practically impossible for a neutral vessel to reach any neutral ports without encountering the danger of passing through the so-called war zone.

Germany justified herself in establishing this war zone because Great Britain had theretofore established a similar war zone taking in the whole North Sea, which she denominated a "military area." Then Germany proceeded to sink merchant vessels within this zone with submerged submarines and without notice, without making any provision for the protection of the lives of seamen on board such vessels. Of course our Government protested violently against this brutal and inhumane treatment, but protest accomplished nothing. Germany contended that the merchantmen of her enemies were armed, and that these arms could sink a submarine with one shot if the submarine came to the surface and attempted to visit a merchantman for the purpose of search. She further contended that as her enemies used the American flag and other neutral flags for the purpose of decoying the submarines to destruction, she could not recognize an American flag; and so the destruction of American freighters went on, with the destruction of the lives of our seamen. We protested to Great Britain against the use of our flag by her and by her allies, but it was, and is, a customary deception practiced by all naval vessels, and Great Britain would not agree to discontinue it.

I have heretofore discussed the provision in this resolution prohibiting the arming of our merchant ships, and requiring proper identification of our ships other than by the use of the flag. If this provision should be adopted, I am convinced that no submarine would sink our ships without notice, and that they would follow the humane and customary rule of visit and search. If such should be the case, then there would be no necessity for the enforcement of this restriction on American ships. It is true that some of the goods on board might be confiscated, and American ships might desire to take that risk; but, in any event, the lives of our seamen would be preserved.

Subsection (b) of section 2 deals with an entirely different subject from that treated in subsection (a), which I have just discussed. It applies to the export and transport of goods to belligerents by any American citizen and upon any vessel, whether it be American, neutral, or belligerent. Subsection (b) can best be described by quoting the exact language. It reads as follows:

(b) It shall be unlawful to export or transport to any belligerent country, or to any country wherein civil strife exists, named in said proclamation or proclamations issued under section 1 of this act, or to any other country for transshipment to, or for the use of, such belligerent country or such country wherein civil strife exists, any articles or materials whatever until all right, title, and interest therein shall have been transferred to some foreign government, agency, institution, association, partnership, corporation, or national. The shipper of such article shall be required to file with the collector of the port from which the articles or materials are to be exported a declaration under oath that there exists in American citizens no right, title, or interest in such articles or materials, and to comply with such rules and regulations as shall be promulgated by the President. Any such declaration so filed shall be a conclusive estoppel against any claim of any American citizen of right, title, or interest in such articles or materials. Insurance written by American underwriters on any articles or materials, the exportation of which is prohibited by this act, or on articles carried by an American vessel or aircraft contrary to subsection (a) of this section shall not be deemed an American interest therein, and no insurance policy issued on such articles or materials and no loss incurred thereunder shall be made a basis of any claim put forward by the Government of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The Senator, I think, answered this query once in the committee; but, in order that there may be no mistake, I desire to have it of record here. In either American bottoms or foreign bottoms, if that provision be complied with, the goods may be transported?

Mr. PITTMAN. They may undoubtedly be transported in anything except American vessels. Under the other section there might be restrictions on the transportation of some of the goods that would not apply to foreign vessels.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. But the subsequent section which the Senator has just read contemplates, does it not, that either in American bottoms or in foreign bottoms there may be transportation of the goods?

Mr. PITTMAN. It does.

I particularly call attention to the first sentence.

It shall be unlawful to export or transport to any belligerent country, and so forth and so forth.

That makes it unlawful for any citizen to export without complying with the conditions, or any ship to transport until the conditions have been complied with. The provision also applies equally to any and all belligerents.

This is a mandatory statute. There is no discretion granted to any agency to relieve any citizen or any ship of the restrictions of the law. This subsection does not place an embargo upon the shipment of any article or material. It is not the intention of the pending joint resolution to place an embargo upon any exports or upon the transportation of any exports except arms, ammunition, and implements of war. It permits our citizens to sell their products for export and transportation abroad, even to belligerents. It requires, however, that the sale must be made in the United States and that title to and possession of such products must be executed to someone else other than a citizen of the United States before such goods may be placed upon any vessel for transportation to a belligerent country. Our Government, of course, is interested in seeing that this law is obeyed. It is therefore provided that proof of such transfer of title and possession shall be made by an affidavit of the seller and filed with the collector of the port from which such articles or materials are to be exported. And it permits our Government to require such additional proof under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe. The object of this reasonable provision is to avoid controversies between our Government and belligerent governments with regard to the charges of our citizens that their goods on the high seas were illegally destroyed or confiscated. These controversies are unfortunate and frequently lead to war. Goods transported to belligerents or for their use are destroyed or confiscated on the grounds that they constitute contraband of war. The definition of contraband of war is quite uncertain and has always been and still is a controversial question as between governments. Grotius in his work in 1625 in discussing contraband divided materials into three classes, namely:

(1) Those that were of use only in war;
(2) Those that were of no use in war but served only for pleasure; and
(3) Those that were useful both in war and in peace.

He held that the first was contraband of war subject to seizure and confiscation; that the second was free; and that the third became contraband of war if the belligerent could not protect himself without seizing it.

This rule has generally been followed, both by the Continental Congress and by the United States Government, in the treaties that they entered into. In modern times the distinctions between the classes of material were sometimes designated as contraband, noncontraband, and conditional contraband. Notwithstanding this generally accepted rule, governments have constantly differed in time of war as to what articles should be placed upon the free list. Our Government, in its treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation with Great Britain in 1794 rather departed from an attempt to describe noncontraband of war. In that treaty it was stated:

> And whereas the difficulty of agreeing on the precise cases in which alone provisions and other articles not generally contraband may be regarded as such, renders it expedient to provide against the inconveniences and misunderstandings which might thence arise: It is further agreed that whenever any such articles so becoming contraband according to the existing laws of nations, shall for that reason be seized, the same shall not be confiscated, but the owners thereof shall be speedily and completely indemnified; and the captors, or in their default the government under whose authority they act, shall pay to the masters or owners of such vessels the full value of all such articles, with a reasonable mercantile profit thereon, together with the freight, and also the demurrage incident to such detention. (Maritime Commerce I: 194–195.)

This treaty divided materials into contraband of war and conditional contraband of war. It provided, however, that when goods were seized on the grounds that they had ceased to be conditional contraband of war, and were claimed to be contraband, that the seizing government should speedily and completely indemnify the owners of such goods for such confiscation.

By the declaration of London, which was the latest attempt of governments to agree upon the subject of contraband, contraband was divided into three classes, namely, absolute contraband, conditional contraband, and noncontraband, with the proviso that any belligerent government upon notice to neutrals might take the materials on the conditional contraband list and add them to the absolute contraband list.

It is interesting to note that in the list of conditional contraband was included foodstuffs, forage and grain, clothing, fabric for clothing, boots and shoes suitable for use in war, vehicles of all kinds available for use in war and their component parts; vessels, crafts, and boats of all kinds; railway material, both fixed and rolling stock; and material for telegraphs, wireless telegraphs and telephones; fuels, lubricants, barbwire, and so forth.

Now let it be remembered also that Prussia, America, Austria, France, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, and Russia all took part through their duly appointed representatives in preparing and agreeing upon that declaration. It was advised and consented to by the United States Senate. It was not ratified and approved by some of the other governments, including Great Britain. Therefore, when the World War commenced all of the belligerent powers declared it of no force and effect and proceeded to violate the very principles with regard to contraband therein established. Great Britain, France, and the other allies immediately issued and proclaimed a list of contraband which included very nearly every material in existence.

Appartently at first they overlooked a few articles and then proceeded to add these articles to the list.

Great Britain, in April 1916, publicly declared that as Germany had incorporated all of its civil population in its military forces and had taken over absolute control of food supplies, she would abolish the distinction between goods absolutely contraband and goods conditionally contraband so long as such conditions existed.

This declaration with regard to contraband, was approved and complied with by Great Britain's allies. It must be remembered that in addition to constituting practically all materials contraband, Great Britain and her Allies asserted the doctrine of continuous voyage and declared, therefore, that anything was contraband—meaning all materials—that was shipped "to order", or that was shipped to an agent of one of its enemies in a neutral country—and they construed anyone in a neutral country who they had reason to believe had transshipped goods into their enemy's country in the class of an agent of their enemy. And so did all of the belligerents finally define contraband, and all adopted the same procedure in applying the doctrine of continuous voyage.

Was this a violation of the generally accepted customs of nations, sometimes called international law? It was certainly subject to serious controversy. Under the generally accepted rule contraband becomes absolute contraband through the doctrine of continuous voyage if it is shipped to a belligerent government or if it is shipped into a belligerent country for the use of the belligerent government in carrying on war, or if it is shipped into a neutral country with its ultimate destination a belligerent country for the use and benefit of the armed forces.

Who is to determine these facts while war is in progress? How can a remedy be exacted during such war? It is possible that after the war the government alleged to be a violator of the laws of neutrality may agree to submit such controversies to arbitration. Such remedies are indefinite and certainly do not relieve the situation during the continuance of the war.

We are dealing in this legislation with what we consider restrictions that will keep us from being involved in such controversies, for fear that the controversies may lead to war, rather than attempted adjustment of matters after war.

The United States is not in a position sincerely further to protest against the action of the belligerent governments with regard to contraband, because just as soon as we entered the World War we issued and proclaimed an absolute contraband list which included substantially every material essential to the industry and life of the people of a country; and we also adopted substantially the same definition with regard to contraband that was originally adopted by Great Britain and her allies.

The Navy Department pointed out in 1918 that in the instructions from the President to the Navy Department relative to what should be contained in the contraband list there was no express distinction between absolute and conditional contraband; that destination was the deciding factor.

I have submitted this fleeting description of the history of the evolution of contraband so that we may understand the effect upon shipments of any material from our country to a belligerent country, or for transshipment to or for the use of a belligerent country. We cannot safely export any of the products of the United States to any belligerent country or to nearby neutral countries in the event of another widespread war conducted in the manner in which the World War was conducted without subjecting such goods to seizure and confiscation. If these products are so seized, there is not the slightest doubt in my mind that if our citizens own them at the time they are seized and confiscated, they will contend that such seizure was contrary to international law, when there is no such thing. They will become excited and violent. They will contend that their neutral rights have been violated. They will protest that they have been denied their rights to the freedom of the seas, and that it is the duty of our Government in the protection of its honor and dignity and the property of its citizens to go to war, if necessary, to protect those alleged rights.

In the very nature of things, the ships of any country may do anything desired and transport any goods on the open sea, because no country owns or has any jurisdiction over the sea beyond its territorial limits. This very situation made it advisable for governments to attempt to have an understanding with regard to the reasonable use of the open seas by all countries, and so certain customs of nations arose, and, so long as they did not threaten their defeat in war, governments abided by them. The rights on the open sea were divided as between the rights of the belligerents and the rights of the neutrals. Naturally, countries fighting for their very existence, for their liberty, and for the lives of their nationals seek to prevent any aid reaching their enemies that threatens their own defeat; and so when belligerents make the rules of naval warfare they make them very restrictive upon neutrals. On the other hand, when countries are at peace and have no fear that they will be dragged into a war and become belligerents, they fight against every restriction upon their citizens and upon their ships and commerce. This is what happened during the World War, when we were at peace; and such was what happened when we became belligerents. There is no law on this subject in the sense that a law is something prescribed by a government that has the jurisdiction to prescribe it and the right to enforce it. There is no law in the sense in which we generally define the word, unless the power is granted to some tribunal to adjudicate the facts as applicable to the law and to render a decision.

International law, of course, can be made by governments through treaties. It has been done many times. Even then it is only international law as between the governments bound by the treaty. It is not binding upon governments not parties to the treaty. It is contended, of course, by distinguished writers upon international law that it does exist, and that disobedience to it does not deprive it of its status as law. I contend that it does cease to be a law if it is disobeyed by governments at pleasure, and there is no treaty to bind them and no method of enforcing judgment and decision. For many years international lawyers have been attempting to codify international law, and they have not yet succeeded in determining what constitutes international law with regard to any vital subjects. I suppose that will be denied, and I shall take up that subject later when I come to it.

We cannot, therefore, effectively determine what are our neutral rights as against belligerents, what constitutes contraband of war, save and except for ourselves; and until we can determine these questions we cannot determine what are our rights as to the freedom of the seas. We can determine for ourselves what our rights are, but we cannot determine that question for the belligerents nor anyone else. If the belligerents do not agree as to what we contend to be our rights in commerce and upon the open seas, we have no remedy that I know of when diplomatic efforts fail except to go to war. I say "determine." We may lose lives all during a foreign war and finally get into it, and after the war is over we may try to collect something. Sometimes other countries will let us pay.

The chief object of this joint resolution is not to attempt to determine neutral rights nor belligerent rights, because they can be determined only by the agreement of governments. By this joint resolution we neither assert a neutral right nor do we admit a belligerent right. Those are matters that we shall probably discuss during the next war and after that war. In the meantime, we simply seek to place upon our citizens, our exports, and our commerce such reasonable restrictions as will tend to eliminate some of the major causes that drag peaceful nations into war. By every provision contained in the pending resolution, it mandatorially applies equally and alike to each and all belligerents. It grants no discretion whatsoever in this matter.

Subsection (b) of section 2 does not deprive any belligerent of the opportunity to receive the products of our country except arms, ammunition, and implements of war. It does not prevent any citizen of our country or anyone within our country from selling his products to anyone for transportation anywhere. It simply provides that the sale must be made in this country to some foreigner or foreign government, and that the product must be the property of a foreign government or national when it leaves our ports and when it is destroyed or confiscated on the high seas. This, therefore, is not unneutral. It certainly is not surrendering any right on the high seas that is of any benefit to any citizen of the United States. We shall continue to insist upon our rights and, if necessary, we shall retaliate against the government or governments whom we believe to be violating those rights.

Mr. President and Senators, we are liable to forget the terrible sacrifices of the lives of our boys during the World War; the blinding, the maiming, and the destruction of the health of those who so pitifully came back to us. Their sorrow, their suffering, and their bodily and mental anguish cannot be even appreciated by us. The grief, the inconsolable grief of the mothers and fathers, brothers, and sisters of those young men who were destroyed in youth and vigor, and those who came back bodily wrecks, should never happen again if by any human sacrifice we can prevent it.

Such a war may come again; in fact, the world today is preparing for such a war. If it comes, let us not be in the position we were in before we entered the last World War. Let us not drift along through diplomatic correspondence and protestation with regard to neutral and belligerent rights while the destruction of the lives of our citizens goes on, until eventually there is repeated the death and destruction and misery and grief that we experienced and the conditions that we have suffered ever since the last great war.

I sincerely believe that the enactment of this joint resolution will keep us out of the next great foreign war. I appeal for the passage of this resolution.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I have listened with the greatest interest to the sustained and persuasive statement made by the able chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. With at least 90 percent of it I am in complete and cordial agreement; and I now state that I think the Senator from Nevada has put the country under a debt to him for the open-minded way in which he has undertaken the composition of the difficulties which his committee confronted. I rise to agree with almost everything he has said, but to dissent with equal vigor and prayerfulness at one very important point in the joint resolution; and at that point I shall offer what I believe to be a corrective amendment.

Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada quoted frequently from the observations of the late Secretary Lansing. I may say in passing that I think one of the most illuminating exhibits that have come to light as an aftermath of our experience in the World War is a memorandum from the late Secretary Lansing which was written on May 3, 1915, and which has just come to the surface through gift of Princeton University. Speaking of the quick disillusionment of neutrals in 1914 and 1915 in respect to their faith in neutral rights, Mr. Lansing said—and this is out of the life story of America in the World War, and it comes at first hand from the man who was in key position to know—

> It did not take many days to show that this belief—
> Namely, the belief in the rights of neutrals—
> was unwarranted. New means of communication, new methods of locomotion, new engines of destruction untested in actual war, and the consequent changes in military and naval operations created new conditions to which the long-established rules of war did not and could not apply.
> The result was a general uncertainty as to what belligerents could properly claim as justified by these changes and to what extent neutral rights were affected. As the war progressed and increased in magnitude and intensity, it became more and more apparent that the existing rules were inadequate, until the standard of conduct which had developed during previous wars seemed to melt away.

Mr. President, we stand in that particular gap this afternoon. It is still true that the existing rules as the world has undertaken to make them and apply them in respect to war for the hundreds of years past no longer stand in the same relationship to physical facts that they did heretofore. The standards of conduct heretofore apparent and heretofore available as precedents have melted away. There is need for a new rule, and, in my humble judgment, the report which has been submitted by the able Senator from Nevada from the Committee on Foreign Relations, with one notable exception, does lay the basis for a new rule of conduct which will extend to the American people, so far as is practicable by statute, as complete a degree of quarantine against other people's wars as it is possible to write in black and white.

I will continue for a moment with this revealing document of the late Secretary Lansing, which has just come to publication. Mr. Lansing became a realist in the midst of his travail and work. Remember this was written during the heat of the controversy.

What does a government whose people are dying by thousands for the sake of their country care about a legal right of property? What is the observance of law compared to a nation's life? How much do commercial interests weigh against the sacrifice of human life? That is the attitude of the governments of warring Europe. Can we blame them for their indifference to our legal rights? Can we blame them for their bitter complaints that we are mercenary, selfish, and unsympathetic when we insist that our rights shall be respected, if to do so seems to conflict with their efforts against their enemies?

Then Secretary Lansing says in this memorandum:

Unless this Government is prepared to back up its threats with force it is useless to make them. No one believes that we could go as far as that, if it can be honorably avoided. There is only one way to avoid the issue, and that is to adopt a conciliatory and amicable tone. Even that may fail to give partial relief, but it is the only way to obtain any relief under present conditions.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that the thing we are undertaking to do in respect to this new permanent neutrality code is to change the conditions under which we shall confront our next challenge and our next crisis if, God forbid, it comes.

In that connection I wish to read one sentence from the late Admiral Sims, who certainly was about as belligerent and dependable a patriotic defender of America as ever wore its uniform and about as far from being a pacifist as a man could be. Admiral Sims said:

If war arises, we must choose between two courses—it is a choice of profits or peace. Our trade as a neutral must be at the risk of the traders. Our Army and Navy must not be used to protect that trade and our country must remain at peace.

That is a very extreme statement of the objective, but, so far as its philosophy is concerned, I subscribe to it completely, namely, that our traditional neutrality policy for 150 years has subordinated peace to commerce, and now we are proposing to subordinate commerce to peace.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. May I presume to contribute a little further to the statement the Senator has made concerning Admiral Sims, who added, what I think is a self-evident truth, that if we are going to preserve the doctrine known as "freedom of the seas" we must prepare to underwrite it by force of arms, by the use of the Army and Navy. He makes that very plain, and certainly he speaks with authority, having commanded the American fleet during the World War; and, I take it, if any man knows what this is all about Admiral Sims should know. In other words, we must prepare to underwrite trade under the "freedom of the seas" doctrine with the lives of our boys. I do not think there can be any escape from that conclusion, which Admiral Sims has made very plain. The election is before us right now. I know the Senator agrees with my views in that respect; at least I think he does.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do agree with the Senator. I think our problem is: Are we willing to pay the price for neutrality? Are we willing to pay the price for a quarantine which has reasonable promise of success?

Mr. BONE. President Roosevelt made that very apparent in a speech delivered by him not long ago when he said we must deliberately make the election between peace and profit.

I hope I am not intruding on the Senator's time.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Not at all.

Mr. BONE. But it seems to me that the worst perversion of logic is to refer to so-called war profits as real profits.

We loaned nations in Europe $12,000,000,000 with which to buy goods from our people, and we are now paying the $12,000,000,000. The debt was translated into bonds on which every Member of the Senate will pay in his income-tax payments within the next few days. It seems to me that of all the stupid perversion of logic is to talk about war profits. To be sure, the Du Ponts made great profits during the war, sufficient to buy control of General Motors and Remington Arms, and to obtain all the worth-while chemical patents in the country, and it must give us a thrill of exultation to know that when we pay our income taxes we are helping the Du Ponts buy all that property. In other words, they cashed in, and the whole country has sweated in the income tax to pay the profits that grew out of the war. That is why I am so much in sympathy with the Senator's viewpoint.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator from Washington for his observation.

The Senator from Nevada has so completely covered the affirmative case in behalf of the joint resolution as submitted that I am quite content to rest my agreement with him upon what he has said, but I would not be satisfied if I should fail briefly to assert the faith that is in me in connection with the particular thing we are now undertaking to do.

I want to register my complete approval of the following affirmative steps which find themselves embodied in this proposed act:

First. I unequivocally endorse the complete mandatory embargo upon loans, credits, arms, ammunition, and implements of war to all peoples in a given crisis. This substantially demonetizes the commercial motive and the profits impulse in whatever degree they may have operated or may hereafter operate, to affect our own domestic status in respect to other people's wars. Furthermore, it automatically removes an inevitable source of international resentments and frictions which, like creeping paralysis, can climax in a deadly menace to our own tranquillity.

Second. I endorse without reservation the complete, mandatory prohibition against American travel in belligerent ships except for a brief period of evacuation after war starts. Whenever a citizen insists needlessly upon going into danger it is the inevitable psychology of the circumstance that he carries his country into precisely the same element of danger. His rights should summarily stop where they intrude upon the rights and safety of 125,000,000 of his fellow citizens back home. "Freedom of the seas" for the individual, in other words, is infinitely less important than "freedom from the war" which might finally have to be fought to vindicate a fruitless principle.

Third. I unequivocally endorse the mandatory so-called "cash and carry" formula respecting the shipment of commodities, other than arms, ammunition, and implements of war, to all belligerents. Under this practice, the commodities are not our goods if they get into subsequent trouble, and consequently their destruction is not an invasion of our rights if anything happens to them. Therefore we avoid the resultant issue which could otherwise lead us into war in defense of a commercial interest that is not worth the hazard involved. True, this reverses and circumscribes traditional practice; but it is far more honorable, as it is also far more practicable, to change the rule ahead of any necessity for its use than to cling to an old practice which asks for trouble, and usually gets it, and which, far too often, involves us in equivocal interpretations of our own rules when we try ultimately to avoid some of the precise responsibilities which the old rules would perpetuate.

Fourth. I unequivocally endorse the addition of armed merchantmen to that group of belligerent vessels, along with submarines, which the President may prohibit from entering our ports; and the mandatory prohibition against arming our own merchantmen when engaged in trade with belligerent countries. The latter provision will eliminate a large measure of incentive to friction and trouble, yet it will not rob our own ships of any realistic defenses.

I believe so deeply in all of these provisions of the joint resolution that I probably ought to dwell at greater length upon them and extend my argument, lest what I shall now emphasize in respect to the sections of the measure which I criticize should seem to be my dominating theme. But if necessary, this can come later. It is simply because the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee has so conclusively covered these strong points that I leave them with this brief endorsement. The brevity of the endorsement in no sense bespeaks any limitation upon the enthusiasm with which I approve the sections to which I have referred. Indeed, it is my profound belief in the wisdom of all these other portions of the bill that leads me the more earnestly to seek to save it from what I believe to be an utterly serious fallacy and weakness of the one portion which I shall now briefly discuss and in connection with which I wish to offer an amendment.

I move to amend the joint resolution by striking out section 2 (a) commencing on page 8, and sections 2 (c) and 2 (d) on page 10. If this amendment carries, there will be need for a slight correction in section 2 (b) at the top of page 10. But the motion in its present form suffices to raise the general issue which I present to the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. May I submit an inquiry to the Senator at that point?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator has moved to strike out subdivision (a) of section 2, and subdivisions (c) and (d).

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. But he would leave intact subdivision (b)?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I did not understand with respect to subdivision (b).

Mr. VANDENBERG. I hope that will remain in the resolution.

Under section 2 (a) the President decides for himself whether commodities (other than arms, ammunition, and implements of war) shall be allowed to travel to belligerents in American ships; and also to decide what commodities shall or shall not be prohibited to American transport.

Under section 2 (c) this Presidential authority expands as the theater of war enlarges.

Under section 2 (d) the President can change his mind about these matters as often as he pleases, and manipulate the embargo accordingly—all within the rule, of course, that his decisions are "necessary to promote the security or preserve the peace or neutrality of the United States or to protect the lives and commerce of nationals of the United States."

Since nothing is certain but uncertainty under this fluid power, it is my conviction that it is impossible to use such a power, under such circumstances, to promote our security or preserve our peace or to protect the lives and commerce of our nationals. On the contrary, I believe the very existence of such a fluid power is inherently an almost unescapable threat to all of these cherished objectives no matter how faithfully any President may seek to act.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. BONE. I do not know that I understood the full extent of the Senator's motion, but I take it he would also want to strike out subdivision (d) of section 2 since it relates wholly to subdivision (a)?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have moved to strike subdivisions (a), (c), and (d).

Mr. BONE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In what I have said thus far regarding the hazard of this discretionary floating Presidential authority, there is no reflection upon the wisdom or the patriotism with which a President might try to use this discretionary power. Let those virtues always be presumed to exist in the White House. The trouble is implicit in the formula itself because we cannot escape the trouble so long as the formula stands. I desire to prove what I mean by that statement.

The subdivisions which I have moved to strike out create a double discretion and this double discretion, in my view, is a double invitation to exercise an unneutral authority; or, let us more scrupulously say, an authority which, when used, will be interpreted as unneutral by whichever belligerent is the more adversely affected. This interpretation will result, in the natural course of human events, no matter how impartially the President may think he has acted and no matter how nobly meditated his action may be. The vice of the matter is inherent in any neutrality decision which is postponed until after the necessity for its application has arisen.

In any given war status, after hostilities are under way, if the President exercises the first of these discretions and takes American ships out of belligerent trade in goods other than munitions, he is bound to hurt one belligerent more than another; and no matter how devotedly he may have thought solely to consult American interests, the effect of his decision will be to precipitate resentment, if not reprisal, from the belligerent which gets the worst of it.

Nor is that all. If the President exercises the second of these discretions and picks and chooses the American commodities—other than munitions—which shall not be carried on our ships, leaving other American commodities that can be carried on our ships, he brings us face to face with a double jeopardy. One, he enrages the belligerent which is principally penalized by his selection of commodities to be proscribed. Two, he morally underwrites the traffic in commodities that are not proscribed, and thus substantially vitiates the effect of the other provisions in the joint resolution which intend that all belligerents shall buy at their own risk. On this latter score this section of the pending measure is incompatible with the balance of the joint resolution. On the former score it can easily be so unneutral, in net effect, as actually to be an invitation to war instead of a warrant for peace. Indeed, under extreme provocation the exercise of such a power could be tantamount to a potential declaration of war itself. Use of such a power can be equivalent to sanctions. Most Americans are opposed to sanctions. Sanctions, in any degree, are not the American road to peace. They are the route into other peoples' wars.

If we learned one thing more than another in our perplexing experiences when we were trying to keep out of the World War, it surely was that basic neutrality decisions cannot be safely made after the necessity for them arises. The inevitable forces of human nature, the inevitable human reactions, make it impossible. Such decisions are at the mercy of belligerent resentment and reprisal abroad. They are at the mercy of commercial pressures at home. I pity the President who would try to use the particular discretion which I discuss. I pity the country's neutrality and the success of its quarantine against other peoples' wars if he should attempt to use it. I think it is inconsistent with the philosophy of the balance of the joint resolution and incompatible with its objectives. My only consolation, if it shall stay in the resolution which I otherwise so heartily applaud, is that the difficulty of its use probably would preclude its use. But if it be not used even the refusal to use it could stir up a hornets' nest of rival clamor. From any viewpoint it is better out than in.

Under the final paragraph which my amendment would delete, the invitation to uncertainty reaches its logical conclusion. The President "may from time to time change, modify, or revoke" his permits to American ships and to commodities carried on them. That, in my view, would be an utterly dangerous manipulation. It would be playing with fire. It would spell serious jeopardy to every objective we are attempting to promote in this measure.

I do not believe there is any tenable middle-ground in dealing with the transportation factor in this equation. We must either write the law so that it orders all American ships out of this trade with belligerents—which would be a needless extreme and one requiring profound study before being embraced—or we must eliminate the present effort to reach shipping in the present joint resolution. The theory of the balance of the resolution, as respects general commodities intended for belligerents, is the theory of transferred risk—namely, that title passes to the foreigner ahead of export. They are foreign commodities—not American commodities—if anything happens to them. The foreigner not only owns them but he, the foreigner, arranges for their transport. The only appropriate specific limitation upon that transport, so far as we are concerned, it seems to me might be to further emphasize the doctrine of "transferred risk" as was proposed in Senate Joint Resolution 60, Clark et al, by voiding any American insurance contracts on an American ship in such trade precisely as it is proposed to void American insurance on the cargo—although, in my judgment, the latter voidance is substantially adequate for all practical purposes.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. At this point in the Senator's argument I wish to suggest that while I am wholly in sympathy with the viewpoint expressed by the Senator and the provisions of the joint resolution which he is discussing at this point, of which he approves, there is always a possibility of very serious trouble arising out of the fact that while the vessel itself might be destroyed by a submarine, by an airplane, or by a war vessel, and while we divorce ourselves from any liability on the part of the Government to make a claim as to the cargo itself, or to lay the foundation upon which a claim could be predicated and which might cause trouble, nevertheless, if the vessel itself were sunk, it is property of the same general type and character as the cargo.

If we are going to divorce ourselves from responsibility, it has seemed to me highly desirable, if we are going to be logical, to divorce ourselves from responsibility for the vessel itself, because we might be dragged, as we were before, into endless controversies over cargoes and vessels that were injured in this trade, and the destruction of a vessel might readily lend itelf to another misunderstanding, as well as the destruction of the cargo.

I feel that it is only the course of logic and horse sense to deprive the vessel itself—the engine, the hull, the whole vessel itself—of the protection which we strike from the cargo; that is, if we are going to be realistic about this matter, and not go to war because some fellow's dollars are injured in war trade.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator carries his argument to a logical conclusion. My difficulty is that there are many other national considerations involved in ships upon the sea which I cannot too lightly dismiss with a simple willingness further to detach ourselves from war trade. It seems to me that if we emphasize the philosophy of transferred risk we have gone a substantial distance in the direction of the goal which we are seeking to reach. So long as subsection (b) of section 2 remains in the joint resolution we have the emphasis upon transferred risk; and the American vessel which goes to sea with foreign goods under those circumstances, particularly if it has to buy foreign insurance in the same connection—and that was the basis of the Clark-Bone-Nye-Vandenberg proposal—it seems to me, is on notice that it is proceeding at its own risk to a degree which would sharply delimit the repercussion if something should happen.

What I wish to say to the Senator from Washington, however, is that if he would achieve the purpose to which he addresses himself in his inquiry to me he certainly cannot do it under the language as it is written in the joint resolution, because this proposal is neither flesh nor fowl; it is half of one thing and half of the other.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield further to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. The thing that disturbs me in this connection, and the thing that is going to rise like Banquo's ghost to disturb all of us if another war occurs in Europe and we are dragged in again because the huckster finds himself in trouble, is surely going to arise under this joint resolution, because the moment the cargo is shipped and title to the cargo has passed from the American vessel and is vested in the belligerent or his agent, if that cargo then be carried in a ship flying the American flag, more surely will that ship be attacked on the high seas; more certainly will we invite an attack on that ship by that very process.

Suppose every belligerent nation knew that every cargo that went from an American port belonged to a belligerent nation but was being shipped in a vessel flying the American flag. Just what is the nation with its back to the wall going to do in a case of that kind? Let us conjure up an imaginary picture.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me interrupt the Senator just at that point to ask him how he has helped himself in respect to the problem he now describes by the language now in the joint resolution, which is simply a fluid power in the hands of the President to say, "This ship may go; that ship may not go. This ship may carry cotton; that ship may not carry copper." Does the Senator think he has arrived at any safety zone by that sort of a discretion?

Mr. BONE. Oh, no! I repudiate the thought that there could be any safety in that sort of business.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is the provision of the joint resolution.

Mr. BONE. That is putting in the hands of one man virtually the right to determine the terms and conditions upon which we might very readily declare war.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Of course I wish to be quite fair about the matter. We are insisting that the President find, as a fact, that there is a jeopardy to American peace when he does it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Nevada, of course.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think the Senator's speech is as fluid as he says the section is. He says the section says that the President may say, "This ship may take cotton and that ship may not take cotton. This ship may take that and that ship may not take that." That may be quite definite to the Senator's mind; but, as a matter of fact, any order the President makes will apply to all American ships.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. The President cannot say that one ship may take cotton and the other copper. I do not want that misunderstood.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I did not intend to draw the distinction the Senator draws. I was simply illustrating the fact that cotton might be permitted to go and copper might be prohibited, or one commodity might be licensed and another commodity might be proscribed. There is no question about that.

Mr. President, that is the point at which I quarrel with the joint resolution. I have said all I wish to say about it, except that in conclusion I desire to quote the observations of one who I think is probably as wise a patriarch upon these problems as we still have under the American flag, Mr. John Bassett Moore. With direct application to the sections of the joint resolution which I am moving to strike out, I read the following:

> It is the discretion given to the President which has drawn sharp and weighty criticism from Mr. John Bassett Moore, the greatest living American authority on international law.
> I am reading from Mr. Lippmann:
> If I understand his objection, it is that to let the President have the power to decide whether a nation may have oil or copper or wheat when it is fighting for its life is to give him power to intervene in the war and perhaps to decide who is to win. Judge

Moore argues that the injured nation would regard whatever the President did as an unfriendly act, as tantamount to waging war on the side of its enemies. "Nothing," he says, "could more surely tend to involve us in war." Moreover, he suggests that to leave the President with such undefined power would mean that he would become the center of furious pressure from Americans who sympathized with one side or the other.

Mr. President, for these reasons, which I have very briefly submitted, I shall ask in due season for a roll call on the amendment striking these sections from the joint resolution. I think the joint resolution is stronger without the sections to which I have been drawing attention. I think without these sections the joint resolution makes a thoroughly splendid advance in the direction of quarantining America against other people's wars. We have probably reached a point in a foreshortened world where we cannot be isolationists, but we certainly have not reached a point where we cannot be insulationists.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I do not wish to take up much of the time of the Senate; but I desire to answer very briefly the arguments presented by the Senator from Michigan in his motion to strike out subsection (a) of section 2.

The Senator has read a published statement by Mr. John Bassett Moore that the action of the President in placing an embargo upon American ships carrying certain goods might be considered unneutral by some of the warring countries, and might lead us into war.

In the first place, I desire to say that I have always denied that that was a reasonable policy that we should consider at all. I think we have a right to protect our safety first; and then, if some government wishes to attack us by reason of our relations with our own citizens, let it attack. We shall not be responsible for such war; it will be on our side of the ocean; we shall have the advantage, and we shall win. I think there is a whole lot more fear in the minds of the people that two warring forces are going to seek to drag us into the war. We do not fear attack.

Germany did not try to drag us into the last war, on the other side of it, although practically all of our exports were going to Great Britain and her allies. Germany had the alternative of deciding whether she should stop sinking merchantmen and destroying commerce which was going to Great Britain and thereby keep us out of the war, or whether she should keep on destroying the commerce and thereby bring us into the war. Her statesmen advised Germany to stop the submarine destruction and thus keep us out of the war, but her naval and army officers gave the contrary advice; and so we went into the war. If, however, we have this constant threat of doing this or doing that in the form of a restriction on our own nationals and our own ships, and therefore by reason of this fear we refrain from protecting the lives of our citizens, we are liable to have war. We have no fear some belligerent is going to sneak around and attack us because we try to keep out of the war.

In the first place, it is totally unreasonable. There have not been many widespread wars where the opposing forces were not quite evenly matched. This is brought about through alliance for balance of power. The next world war I have in mind would be the same kind of a world war we had 20 years ago. Every one of the countries engaged in the last World War would be in it and perhaps others. Just exactly how they would be divided, I do not know, but there would be plenty of divisions. Neither side will desire to force us on the other side.

I say again that there is nothing we can do toward restraint of our citizens or our own commerce that will induce either side in a coming war to commit an act of war against us, and they would not have done it in the World War if they had known what the result was to be. The statesmanship of Germany regrets today that they ever continued with the submarine warfare and forced the United States into the war against it; there is no question about that.

Even if it could be held that it is unneutral for us during war to withhold the shipment of products to the countries which had generally been receiving them, that could not happen under the proposed law, even with subsection (a) of section 2 in it, because subsection (b) of section 2 allows foreign belligerents to get anything they want in this country. They can come and get it in their own ships; they can come and get it in the ships of any other neutral. If we should absolutely prohibit our ships from going out of our harbors, no belligerent would be injured at all. The only one who could be injured would be the shipping company, and in certain cases I would rather we should pay hundreds of millions of dollars in the form of bonuses to shipping companies than to have the lives of seamen taken as they were taken during the last war. This subsection is inserted in order to save the lives of seamen.

The property of our citizens would be saved under subdivision (b). The subdivision I am discussing, subsection (a), is to save the lives of seamen, and it will not be used unless it is necessary to save the lives of seamen, but if it were necessary, and I were in control, rather than send the sailors on our merchant vessels into the danger zone in the ocean, unmarked and mysterious, and have submarines sink them without notice, in the nighttime, and with no precautions to protect their lives, I would rather tie up every one of our ships in the harbors of this country and pay the ships a bonus for having injured them. But I do not believe that any ship would be injured if we should not allow them to carry a solitary thing to a belligerent country during a war such as the one we had before.

As far as belligerents are concerned, they will be seeking big ports like ours. The ports on the Pacific and South Atlantic will be abandoned by many ships, as they were during the last World War. Shipping to every place except to the big ports will be gone. There is no doubt but that our merchant marine can easily and rapidly transfer its commerce from belligerent ports to neutral ports of the world.

In such a world war as the one we had before there are going to be great inducements to American ships to sail into belligerent ports, and I would not let them sail into belligerent ports under the conditions which existed in the last war. But if the conditions are different, if there is some respect on both sides shown for us during the next world war, no such act as that proposed will be necessary.

Again, no such act will be necessary if we do not allow our ships to arm. Never again will a belligerent submarine sink our neutral ship that is known to be unarmed. This provision is not intended to prevent cargo destruction; it is intended to prevent the destruction of seamen.

I am unwilling that there should not be some provision in the measure to protect the lives of seamen on our freight ships.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire concerning the matter of vessels flying the American flag handling cargoes of the character contemplated in subsection (b) of section 2.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, will not the Senator speak a little louder? All I am fit for in this debate today is to listen, and I should like to hear what is said.

Mr. BONE. I apologize to the Senator. Subsection (b) of section 2 requires any shipper to divest himself of title, but I assume without question that an American vessel might transport such cargo.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think so; it is not prohibited.

Mr. BONE. I wish to suggest again that it seems to me there would be every impulse on the part of a belligerent to want to destroy a vessel carrying cargo the title to which had vested in a belligerent nation that was engaged in war with the nation having the submarine or the airplane out in the open. Therefore the sailors on a ship flying the American flag carrying that type of cargo might certainly more likely subject themselves to the danger of being destroyed than if the cargo belonged to American citizens. It would seem that way to me. I suggest that to the Senator, because I am sure he must have thought of that particular phase of this controversy. I am wondering whether it would not be the part of wisdom, since we are withdrawing protection by this means from one form of property, to withdraw it from the other form of property, which is the vessel itself.

Mr. PITTMAN. I see the Senator's point, but the very minute the title is transferred to a foreign government, or to the agency of a foreign government, or to a national of a foreign government, we get that much closer to the question of contraband, and if the goods are contraband, they are subject to destruction.

POSTPONEMENT OF STAR-ROUTE CONTRACT AWARDS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEE in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 84) to authorize the Postmaster General to withhold the awarding of star-route contracts for a period of 60 days, which were, in line 4, to strike out "any star-route contract" and insert "star-route contracts for which bids have been received in the first contract section", and in line 5, to strike out "31" and insert "1."

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who is occupied in a hearing, I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments. The effect of the main amendment is to accomplish all that is desired. The only star-route contracts which are involved and which can be postponed relate to the northeast section of the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, for my information, what is the principle involved, and what was the source of the controversy between the House and the Senate?

Mr. HAYDEN. There is no source of controversy. The House merely defines in a better way what is sought to be done.

Mr. KING. As I recall, when the bill was before the Senate the Senator from Tennessee objected to it.

Mr. HAYDEN. No; the Senator from Tennessee favors the enactment of the proposed legislation. It is by his request that I am moving that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

Mr. KING. If it meets the views of the Senator from Tennessee, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House to Senate Joint Resolution 84.

The motion was agreed to.

AMERICAN NEUTRALITY

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 51) to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war", approved August 31, 1935, being Public Resolution No. 67, Seventy-fourth Congress (S. J. Res. 173), as amended by joint resolution approved February 29, 1936, entitled "Joint resolution extending and amending the joint resolution (Public Res. 67, 74th Cong.), approved August 31, 1935."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, section 1 of the pending measure provides, in general, that when the President finds a state of war to exist between foreign governments he shall issue a proclamation to that effect, and it shall be unlawful thereafter to ship arms, munitions, and implements of war to the belligerent countries or to neutral countries for the purpose of reshipment. I think all the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations are entirely favorable to that provision. It seems to me a wise provision.

The next important section provides that practically the same rule shall prevail where the President finds that civil strife has reached such magnitude as to endanger the peace of the United States. That also, I think, has the entire approval of the committee.

There is a provision also which prohibits the making of loans or the establishing of credits for belligerents. There is also a provision which prevents American citizens from traveling on belligerent ships, and a provision relative to arming merchant ships. As I understand, there was no controversy in the committee on those questions, and I very heartily approve them myself.

I regret, however, that I am unable to follow the Senator from Nevada, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, with reference to subdivisions (a) and (b) of section 2. The subject of neutrality is a difficult subject on which to legislate, and in my judgment the chairman of the committee has, with a great deal of patience, industry, and ability, worked out a very desirable measure except as to two provisions. But these two subdivisions seem to me to establish an entirely new national policy, and if they are to have that effect, certainly we ought not to pass them without very thorough discussion as to their probable bearing upon the interests of our people.

Something has been said already in regard to subdivision (a) of section 2. I desire now to call attention to subdivision (b) of section 2. This is to be a statute, not to be put into operation in the discretion of the President, but is to be an established law of the country. It becomes a rigid statute when the President issues his proclamation under section 1. The President is given no discretion as to its terms or as to its operation.

I read subdivision (b) of section 2:

(b) It shall be unlawful to export or transport to any belligerent country, or to any country wherein civil strife exists, named in said proclamation or proclamations issued under section 1 of this act, or to any other country for transshipment to, or for the use of, such belligerent country or such country wherein civil strife exists, any articles or materials whatever until all right, title, and interest therein shall have been transferred to some foreign government, agency, institution, association, partnership, corporation, or national. The shipper of such article shall be required to file with the collector of the port from which the articles or materials are to be exported a declaration under oath that there exists in American citizens no right, title, or interest in such articles or materials, and to comply with such rules and regulations as shall be promulgated by the President. Any such declaration so filed shall be a conclusive estoppel against any claim of any American citizen of right, title, or interest in such articles or materials. Insurance written by American underwriters on any articles or materials, the exportation of which is prohibited by this act, or on articles carried by an American vessel or aircraft contrary to subsection (a) of this section shall not be deemed an American interest therein, and no insurance policy issued on such articles or materials and no loss incurred thereunder shall be made a basis of any claim put forward by the Government of the United States.

The section is well drawn to accomplish the purpose which the able Senator has in mind. I make no technical objection to the section. But I inquire what will be the effect of this provision if it is made the established law? A great deal has been said, Mr. President, and it occurred today in the debate, about making profits out of war. I think the able Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] said that we had in the past sacrificed peace to profits, and now we are going to sacrifice profits to peace. Now, Mr. President, this provision does not sacrifice any profits. If foreigners come and buy, our people may sell at any figure at which the purchasers are willing to buy, and make any amounts of profits that war conditions enable them to make. Great Britain could come here and buy all our cotton or all our copper, if she were prepared to buy and pay for it, or as the able Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has said, buy anything that she desires, except arms, munitions, and implements of war, and the question of profits would obtain just the same as if the goods were carried in our ships or sold abroad by our agents. The question of profits, in other words, is not eliminated in any sense. We are making profits out of war. If we will just simply keep ourselves off the ocean the question of how much we make out of the war has no limitation upon it whatever. We seek to avoid all risks, all danger, but we make certain to get all the profits.

I ask, Who will make these profits? Why, the big corporations of the country. There is no one else who in all probability can meet these situations and supply the materials which will be necessary. The great oil companies can make their profits. The steel interests can make their profits. The munitions makers in an indirect way can make their profits. It will result, in my humble opinion, in the great corporate interests of this country furnishing supplies to those nations to whom they wish to furnish the supplies, to any nation that wants them and to which they are willing to sell. A perfect combination can be made between a nation and the great corporations of this country to supply anything that the nation in question needed. They would run the war.

What would have been the result at the beginning of the World War, with the American interests and other people's interests in that situation being what they were, had this provision been the permanent law of the land at that time? Americans could have supplied the Allies with whatever the Allies desired, and their profits might have been anything that they could make, and there would have been no limit upon the transactions whatever. Or they could have supplied the Central Powers.

Now, what becomes of the question of making profits out of war?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The references that I was making to the subject of demonetizing war go chiefly to the other sections of the bill, which, I am sure the Senator will readily agree, do circumscribe the possibility of making profits.

Mr. BORAH. I thoroughly agree with all the provisions of the bill with the exception of subdivisions (a) and (b) of section 2. I cannot speak too highly of the measure as it stands so far as these other provisions are concerned. It is well drawn and covers the subject, and covers it effectively, and I am thoroughly in accord with it. But I ask the Senators to consider seriously how this new proposition is going to work. It makes us an ally with Great Britain in such a war as came up the last time. It makes us an ally with Japan upon the Pacific coast. What other nations, which do not have the navy to protect the purchases, can come here and get them? It is a program for nations with large navies. It spells the doom of small nations.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. What provision would the Senator suggest that would prevent us from becoming an ally to Japan and Great Britain in that particular way that he suggests?

Mr. BORAH. If we were carrying the material ourselves, or selling the material ourselves, we could sell it to any nation or carry it to any nation we might choose, however small or incapable the nation might be as a naval power. Only those nations which are capable of coming and getting the material, those who have the big navies of the world, can come and operate under this provision.

Mr. PITTMAN. I cannot quite agree with the Senator. It does not say that no ships except belligerent ships can come and get the goods. There might be 50 neutrals in the next war. There were 50 neutrals during the last war. The ships of neutrals can come and get the goods.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if Great Britain or Japan were interested in the question, there would be very few neutrals who would enter into transactions contrary to their interests.

Mr. PITTMAN. There were very few neutrals that helped Germany during the World War.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly. They were whipped into line. But I am sure the Senator will agree that if the nations which have great navies now desire to command this situation, they can do it.

Mr. GERRY rose.

Mr. PITTMAN. They can command it whether the goods are paid for here or are not paid for here.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not agree with that proposition. The United States is one of the great powers of the world. It cannot be dictated to unless it consents to be dictated to on every question which arises upon the part of other nations. We might be perfectly willing to carry these goods under different terms than those which Great Britain would permit.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not disagree with anything that the Senator has said with regard to those governments that have control of the sea, by which their navies, generally speaking, can control where the goods can go; but as concerns the effect had upon them I do not see what difference it would make whether the goods are paid for in this country or paid for somewhere else.

Mr. BORAH. I now yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. GERRY. I agree heartily with what the Senator from Idaho is saying, that the real crux of the question is the control of the sea. If our Navy is strong enough, we can dictate to any belligerent country. We cannot be second to any if we really want a carrying out of neutrality. That is fundamental.

But what I had in mind when I rose to my feet was to ask the Senator from Idaho a question. One of the final acts that brought us into the World War was the German declaration enlarging and extending the blockade. One of the things that has been troubling me with reference to this joint resolution is this: If we have the cash-and-carry plan, it seems to me we have eliminated all the rules of blockade so far as we are concerned, or our interests are concerned, and that ships of neutral nations or the belligerent nations that are carrying goods right from our ports are liable to search and seizure immediately outside our ports. Of course, during the World War Great Britain had warships outside our ports before we came into the war. But it seems to me that the danger is much greater, especially with our coastwise shipping. Possibly we may be carrying goods to South American ports which are not blockaded, there being no line of blockades which will cause the search and seizure to be made much closer to our own waters, and our own shipping will be interfered with because, as the chairman of the committee stated, during the World War even in the blockade area it was very difficult for the German submarines to determine what was neutral shipping and what was not.

Mr. BORAH. I thank the Senator from Rhode Island.

What tendency has this to keep us out of war?

Mr. PITTMAN. It prevents an excitement in this country on the part of our citizens if they lose their goods. There was considerable excitement of that nature during the World War.

Mr. BORAH. Yes. Now, Mr. President, let us assume that the condition is such as it was in the beginning of the World War, because we are not concerned about the little wars that happen in the different parts of the world which do not concern us. As the Senator from Nevada stated, he is thinking about a world war, a conflict involving great nations. Let us suppose that two or three nations, such as Russia and Germany and Japan, are fighting with their backs to the wall, that all have strong navies, and one of the belligerents comes here to buy our goods at our ports; it would transfer the war to our shores. Does the Senator suppose that one belligerent will stand idly by and see the goods loaded upon ships which are carrying them to its opponents?

Mr. PITTMAN. Why did they not transfer the war to our ports during the last war?

Mr. BORAH. They did come very near doing so. They were right in our ports on two or three different occasions. Had this law been in operation, I fear the scene would have been closer home.

Mr. PITTMAN. Did they not move supplies themselves, and did they not have the right to come outside our ports, as they have now, and is it not a matter of fact that they selected the areas in which they destroyed commerce?

Mr. BORAH. I am speaking now in case we did not undertake to go on the ocean, but the ships of some belligerent nation came here for the purpose of carrying away our goods. I say that another belligerent nation will not stand idly by and see those goods loaded upon the ships of its enemy.

Mr. PITTMAN. The belligerent ships of Great Britain herself were here all the time before we went into the war.

Mr. BORAH. We were not then operating under any law such as the one now proposed.

Mr. PITTMAN. But they were here, and they were not attacked outside of our ports. There were 10 times as many neutral belligerent ships moving our goods as there were American ships moving our goods.

Mr. BORAH. The next war, Mr. President, will, in all probability, be fought as much by airplanes as it will by ships, and perhaps more so, and the transaction by which we transfer our help to some belligerent will take place where the airplanes can reach us just the same as they could reach us upon the ocean.

I cannot conceive of a nation fighting for its life not making any effort to prevent our supplying its enemy, and if the effort should be made it seems to me the inevitable result would be to draw the war closer to our shores than if we should undertake to carry the goods ourselves. I do not see how it prevents profits in war; I do not really see how it really contributes to peace. I see how the great corporations of this country would be practically in control of supplying materials to belligerent nations.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not think that it has any control over profits, and I do not think that it has any effect on the goods at all, except that when they are destroyed, as goods were destroyed during the last war, it will not be our goods that will be destroyed; and, of course, every time the goods of an American citizen are destroyed during a war he thinks it is wrong and he certainly makes a complaint. It will eliminate that controversy as to the destruction of property which in the past we have claimed was illegally destroyed.

Mr. BORAH. If the able Senator will permit me to say so, it seems to me that it puts us at once in alliance with those big-navy nations which can come and get the goods.

Mr. PITTMAN. Our merchant marine is so small even now by comparison with the merchant marine of Great Britain that they would not have to depend on our carrying the goods any more than they depended on our carrying the goods during the last war.

Mr. BORAH. And our merchant marine will always be small if we indicate our willingness to get off the sea every time there is a howl that danger is upon us.

Mr. PITTMAN. We did not get off the seas the last time, and we came out of the war victorious; but I hope we shall never again have to win such a costly and futile victory.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, does not the Senator think, though, that when we adopt such a policy as he has indicated, under which neutrals and belligerents carry goods from our shores, and they are not carried by our shipping, the nations engaged in war will not fear American reprisals so much and will come closer and closer to our ports, and especially after we have enacted legislation such as this, which fundamentally states that we want to avoid war at all cost and that we are not preparing to protect ourselves?

Mr. BORAH. I quite agree with the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I should like to submit a further suggestion. I think that the economic proposition will appeal to many people more strongly than anything else; and if we should compel the people of this country to take cash instead of taking some of the notes of the people of foreign nations that would be a very good thing, would it not?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; that would be a very good thing. When we can get cash from the people over there, let us take it rather than agreements to pay.

Mr. PITTMAN. Let us, then, put it on purely economic grounds.

Mr. BORAH. Furthermore, Mr. President, we do not undertake to deal with neutral trade. Our ships may carry all kind of materials to neutral ports, that is, if they are not for transshipment. Let us bear in mind that our first great controversy of the last war arose over the interference of certain belligerents with our shipments to neutral ports. There was not a scintilla of evidence produced then or later that such shipments were designed for transshipment. The belligerents went upon the ocean, found our flag and our ships, they took them into their ports and unloaded them, even if they were bound for a neutral port. The first great difficulty which President Wilson had was not with interference with shipping to belligerents but with shipping to neutrals. If in this instance we are going to keep out of war upon the theory of the bill, keep away from the danger of war, we must stop our shipping on the sea, because other nations at war will not discriminate as between neutral or belligerent ports, as they failed to do in the World War. Furthermore let us suppose our ships upon the ocean carry goods to neutrals what will be the attitude of these belligerents whose antagonists are being supplied by the United States. They will not be neutral ships in their eyes, they will be the ships of a nation which they regard as in alliance with their antagonist.

Mr. PITTMAN. I agree with the Senator that it is quite true that, through the doctrine of continuous voyage, which we have confirmed, we had a great deal of controversy over whether goods destined for a neutral country were for transshipment. I agree with him also that we can never entirely remove the controversy between neutrals and belligerents over shipments of goods to a neutral country, at least to a country which is nearby, as we know from experience.

I do not want to go any further than we have gone in section (b); that is, with regard to shipments to a belligerent country; and if the Senator from Idaho does not think that is safe enough, I do not know of any amendment he can offer except to prohibit the sale of goods to any country.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator misunderstands my position if he thinks I want to put any more handicaps on our shipping; I do not; but what I am saying is that this measure, as well said by the Senator from Nevada, is not one for protecting neutral rights; it is a joint resolution designed to keep us out of war. I am undertaking to show that if we, as a great nation, are furnishing materials to a belligerent nation, and other belligerent nations are concerned, it will inevitably draw us into the war. It may not be a war upon the ocean, but it will be a war to stop our supplying the materials. They will drop their bombs upon our manufacturing plants; they will destroy our manufacturing plants. If their backs are to the wall, they will not sit idly by and see the great United States throw all its war materials into the laps of belligerent nations.

Mr. PITTMAN. Is not that what we did during the World War? I do not see where the change comes in. If there should be a world war again and the commodities we produce should be shipped abroad, the same situation would arise as during the World War, for the great navies would control the shipments. Therefore the only question I am considering is whether or not, in the tremendous destruction of property which will be involved, the property will belong to our citizens, who are going to have it paid for before it leaves our ports.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me we are going to have the war closer to us rather than to have it farther away.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the war was brought closer to our shores, it would not result in the destruction of the property of our citizens.

Mr. BORAH. It would do so if they destroyed the manufacturing plants.

Mr. PITTMAN. But they did not destroy the manufacturing plants during the last war.

Mr. BORAH. They certainly tried to do so.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator is proceeding on the theory that they want to invite us into war.

Mr. BORAH. No; I am not proceeding on that theory; I am proceeding on the theory that no belligerent nation will permit us to supply material necessary for its belligerent opponent to carry on its war if it can prevent it.

Mr. PITTMAN. How are we going to prevent supplying it unless we place an embargo on all of it?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not one of those who believe that it is possible to provide a complete remedy against war, but what I am saying is that, in my opinion, while the Senator has drawn an excellent measure, which does in many instances diminish the possibilities of war, it does not, in my opinion, fit in with the philosophy of the rest of the joint resolution.

Mr. PITTMAN. And I do not think there will be any change whatever with regard to bombing our country or where the goods go, whether or not they are paid for in this country; but I think it is the best thing that it is possible to do. It does not change the character of the goods; it does not change the effect of the goods; it does not change where the goods shall finally go; it does not have any effect upon what belligerents will do about them. I cannot see that it makes any difference in those respects; but if we strike it out, they can pay for the goods with draft attached and if we leave it in they pay for the goods on this side, and I do not think anybody will draw any distinction as to the goods.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, it is a matter of more or less conjecture as to what will happen; I agree to that; but suppose, for instance, Japan was engaged in a war with Russia; Japan could come to our shores, if she had the money, and could get whatever she wanted, for she has a big navy. Russia, in all probability, could not because she has not the navy. In that sense we would be practically, so far as carrying on the war is concerned, in alliance with Japan.

Mr. PITTMAN. It would make no difference whether the goods were paid for in this country or paid for outside this country.

Mr. BORAH. It might be so, but if Russia had an opportunity, she would certainly seek in every possible way to make it impossible for us to supply those goods to Japan.

Mr. PITTMAN. Would she not do that whether the goods were paid for in this country or not paid for?

Mr. BORAH. Then, I am wondering what we are accomplishing by this measure.

Mr. PITTMAN. We are trying to keep some of our American citizens from losing any more property. That should have an economic appeal, for they make a tremendous row when they lose it.

Mr. BORAH. If it transfers the controversy with reference to the property from the high seas to the ports and shores of the United States, we are not saving the property of our citizens.

Mr. PITTMAN. But we have not transferred it to our ports.

Mr. BORAH. That is what is going to be done under the provisions of the pending joint resolution.

Mr. PITTMAN. The main object of a belligerent who cannot get the goods is to destroy the goods, whether they are paid for or not. If it had been their naval strategy to come in front of our doors and search our vessels, they would have done so. It would be very difficult for Japan to come 7,000 miles and maintain a blockade of our shores. It would be very difficult for Great Britain to maintain a blockade 3,000 miles from her shores. They found it much easier as a matter of naval strategy to utilize the North Sea as the point of concentration to watch freight going to Germany than to come along our shore, which is 2,000 miles in length, and undertake a blockade.

Mr. BORAH. It is apparent to me that no nation except a great naval nation could obtain these supplies from the United States, and it is perfectly clear to me that only the great corporations could furnish those supplies. It may not be so clear that it would transfer the contest to these shores, but I think the probabilities are that it would. We are into the business of making profits out of war; we will be in practical alliance with the nations with big navies. If that does not get us into trouble, I do not know what would.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not see where the difference comes, whether the goods are paid for or not paid for, as to their control by a corporation. I do not quite see that point.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GERRY. Is there not the question that with our ships not carrying the goods, it is much more apt that the nations which are suffering the most will use their submarines along our coast? That is what I am really afraid of, and that they may interfere with our coastwise traffic. We are thus more apt to get the country into war than we would be if there was a blockade far away from our shores, carrying out under the rules of blockade.

Mr. PITTMAN. Nobody carried out the rules of blockade during the last war, and I do not think they will again.

Mr. GERRY. I do not think they will carry out the rules of search and seizure.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think they will if our ships are armed. I have been interested to know why the Senator from Idaho thought, if the goods were paid for before they left our shores, it would tend to increase control of them by our large corporations.

Mr. BORAH. Because they are the only ones who can take advantage of the situation.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does the Senator mean in the matter of paying for them?

Mr. BORAH. I mean supplying them. In other words, they are prepared to supply the raw materials and may choose the nation to whom they will sell. They might refuse to sell to Germany and choose to sell to Great Britain. They are the only ones who can supply oil and steel and, in large measure, cotton, and they may choose to whom they would sell.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does not that occur whether the goods are paid for in advance or not? Control of oil, control of copper, and control of the matter of transportation is in the hands of a very few people. I do not see what difference control over it has whether the goods are paid for before they leave our shore or afterward. I do not know how we could change that.

Mr. BORAH. If we combine the great navies of the world, the great naval nations of the world, with the great corporations of the world who are in control of the raw materials, they have control of the war.

Mr. PITTMAN. And so they had during the last world war.

Mr. BORAH. I do not care to discuss some things that happened in the last world war, but we are much wiser now since that experience.

Mr. PITTMAN. I agree with everything the Senator has said except I do not see where the paying of our farmers for their wheat will really change the whole transaction.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I should like to submit an idea to the Senator from Idaho on the specific point of the effect of making foreign nations pay for the goods before the goods leave our shores. The Senator said it would result in the large corporations having control. I should like to suggest this idea. We have a large amount of wheat produced in this country, we will say. If it must be paid for before it goes upon a boat, then the title to it passes. It seems to me that with their facilities for credit, with the possibilities the large corporations have of extending credit to the nations of the world, the belligerent nations would be less likely to profit than they would if we did not insist upon the goods being paid for before they leave here. In other words, if they have to get the cash, then anybody in the United States can sell, the small corporation as well as the large corporation. The small corporation can produce its little amount and know that when its product gets to a seaport it will receive its pay. That small corporation cannot set up a credit arrangement whereby somebody in England can take it over there and pay for it over a long period of years. The large corporation can do that, and the large corporation did do it through the banking facilities of the house of Morgan during the last war. I think the result would be absolutely contrary to the Senator's desire.

Mr. BORAH. It might be possible that the small businessman could get some meager advantage out of it, dealing in a particular kind of commodity; but the great war materials, the things necessary for carrying on the war, are now in the control of great corporations and they could sell or not sell to any belligerent as they chose.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. The Senator is not discussing now that portion of the bill which refers to arms, munitions, or implements of war. He is referring to the other sections which do not refer to war materials.

Mr. BORAH. Oil would come under subdivision (b) of section 2. Copper and cotton would come under it. All the great war materials necessary for war would come under it. That is what I am discussing. These commodities are in the control of great corporations, of great combines, and they could choose their clients. They could choose to whom they would sell. It would make a perfect combination between the great naval nations of the world and the great material combines of the world.

Of course, I know that is not the intention. I am not intimating anything of that kind. I am speaking of what I believe will be the practical working of it. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] thinks it will lessen the possibilities of conflict. I am giving my view, which is that, in my opinion, it will not lessen the possibilities of conflicts, while it does make a combination which I am sure the Senator does not desire nor do the people of the United States desire, and that is a combination between the raw-material producers of the world and the big navies of the world.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BONE. If there is a war in Europe between a great powerful nation with a powerful navy and a nation without a navy, it would not make much difference what we did. The nation with the navy would control the avenues of trade regardless of what we might do. We cannot change that fact.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not quite agree with that. I do not think the Senators and my President agree to it.

Mr. BONE. What is there within our power to change that picture? If, for instance, Russia, with no navy of any consequence—so far as I know, it has no navy of any size—should get into war with England, it would not make any difference what we might attempt to do because England would control the seas. What would be our position between the two? It seems to me then we would have to become affirmatively a party to the affair. We are salesmen, and that is all they are contemplating, that America will remain salesmen; but the party who buys will take the products at our shores, pay cash, and take delivery in whatever way he can get it, perhaps in American ships, perhaps in foreign bottoms.

During the last war—and I think we must certainly permit our footsteps to be guided by experience—the American bankers arranged most of the transfers in trade. They made the financial arrangements by which vast aggregations of commodities were put together, transported to the Atlantic gateways, and shipped across the seas.

Mr. BORAH. I know, because I have heard the Senator say so many times, that he is anxious to stop these huge war profits from being made by the persons whom he speaks of as the Morgans, the Du Ponts, and so forth. The Senator must admit, I think, that he is not stopping one red cent of war profits.

Mr. BONE. Oh, I would go beyond anything that has been suggested by the Senator and my colleagues; and, if it were possible, I would embargo this sort of traffic on the theory that, as drastic a remedy as that seems to be—to many it is a sort of a Draconian code—I would do it if I could, because the most illusory thing in the world is this one called "war profits."

On the fifteenth of this month, when the Senator pays his income tax, he will be paying these "war profits."

Mr. BORAH. Why bring that up? [Laughter.]

Mr. BONE. The Senator will be continuing to do it for years. There is not any such thing as "war profits." Why do we permit ourselves to be fooled by the talk of world trade, when the net result of world trade in war, when nations have their backs to the wall, when their boys are dying, is nothing but ashes of despair in the mouth of everyone who has anything to do with it?

We did not make any money out of the World War. Why try to protect a war trade when there is no profit in it for anybody? The taxpayers of this country are going to be sweated for generations to pay for it.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is not diminishing war trade. The Senator is not prohibiting war trade. The Senator is permitting war trade. The Senator is permitting war profits. He says, in effect, "We saw a storm coming. We got in the cellar. If you will just come to our cellar door and bring the cash, we will take your cash, but we will not risk ourselves out on the sea." According to the Senator's proposal, we will get all our profits, we will get all our sordid gains, we will get all our war trade just the same. We take all the trade we can get, we feed the war by furnishing raw material, we swell the profits of those who have the materials; but we have done more, we have sacrificed the American reputation for courage.

Mr. BONE. I do not believe there will be nearly the war trade that there has been heretofore when war-risk insurance cannot be written. The able Senator from Idaho was in this body when war was declared; and he will remember, as all of us remember who followed the tragic course which was taken at that time, that one of the first things Congress did when these hucksters could not get insurance on their cargoes was to enact a law under which this Government of ours underwrote that business with the War Risk Insurance Act. In other words, we did here consciously, purposefully, the thing that stimulated a tremendous war trade. If Congress had not enacted that bill, I think the tempo of that trade would have been stepped down tremendously.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator will recall what President Wilson said, and the great problem he had to meet. He was facing a financial crisis in this country. He was facing an economic collapse; and if our war trade had been stopped, or if it had been prevented in any way, in his judgment the collapse would have taken place.

Mr. BONE. Let us stop at this point. I hope I am not intruding on the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. No; not at all.

Mr. BONE. I desire to make some contribution to the thought in these matters as we go along.

Mr. BORAH. It does not annoy me at all.

Mr. BONE. Suppose we had not entered the war. Suppose we had clamped down an iron embargo on war trade. We should not have had this frightful war debt that was hung around our necks, and we probably should have emerged from that crisis much better than we did.

Mr. BORAH. No; but we should have had a riot in the United States.

Mr. BONE. We may have one yet as the result of the huge debts that were clamped on us by the war.

Mr. BORAH. If we will go back and look over the transactions of that period as recorded by Mr. Ray Stannard Baker in his fifth volume of the Life of Woodrow Wilson, we will find that the one problem that agonized Mr. Wilson as much as anything else was how to keep up the financial and economic conditions in this country; and if those conditions had collapsed, Germany would have won the war, we should not have had anything to fight with.

Mr. BONE. The net result of that is an army of insane boys, a tremendous burden of pensions, the provision of a greater Army and Navy than we ever knew before, and a debt that is going to stretch to infinity. That is all we got out of the war.

Mr. BORAH. I am one of those who believe there are some things that we have to fight for and will fight for.

Mr. BONE. Does the Senator believe we should fight for war traffic?

Mr. BORAH. I believe in fighting for the substantial rights which are essential to the preservation of the economic welfare of this Nation. Those things which are fit only for war, fit only for destruction I would not sell or ship, but those things indispensable to human comforts and human life I would sell and ship and I would fight for the right to do so.

Mr. BONE. I cannot bring myself to believe that we ought to call into existence an army of boys who must die in the horrible fashion that they are going to die in the next war in order to preserve the thing called war trade. In other words, we have to lay the rights, the welfare, the dollars and cents of hucksters in one pan of the scales and in the other pan lay the lives of perhaps hundreds of thousands of boys. I, for one, do not believe our national honor is outraged because, forsooth, Mr. Du Pont will lose the sale of a cargo of powder.

Mr. BORAH. No.

Mr. BONE. Why should the boys of this country die in order to keep Mr. Du Pont's profits flowing into his coffers?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we found out during the early days of the World War that somebody aside from Mr. Du Pont was interested in economic conditions.

Mr. BONE. I agree with the Senator about that.

Mr. BORAH. The farmers of the country, the producers of the country, the miners of the country, were here in Washington, and they were well represented; and they were not hucksters. They were the producers. They were the people whose boys would go to war if war was to be carried on. They were American citizens, and they thought they had certain rights; and I think they had.

Look at the situation today. The nations of the world are armed as never before in the history of the world. They are, some of them, spending twice as much for armaments this year as they spent last year. We cannot hope to avoid meeting some great crisis in this situation, and we must be prepared to meet it. Every sane man or woman must be against war and in favor of peace; but this is a realistic world in which we live. For that reason, while we want peace and talk of peace and hope for peace, we build huge navies, because we know that in this world of ours we cannot disregard the conditions which surround us; and the same thing is true of economic affairs.

We know perfectly well that whatever else happens in the world, this struggle for economic supremacy will go on between the nations. We know that in order to be secure we must be economically strong. We know that the first line of defense is the economic power of the nation. We know that no nation ever found security or economic justice through surrendering its just and essential rights. Therefore, there are some things which the Senator would fight for, and some things which we would all fight for. We are not going to surrender our essential national rights; the people will not let us do so.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I hope I am quite as realistic as the Senator from Idaho, whose judgment I value and admire; but most of the little fellows to whom reference has been made here—the farmers who got $2 or $2.25 a bushel for their wheat—have been liquidated over the dreary years that followed the war, and they have not achieved anything definite or substantial out of the war. I think everybody admits, and certainly President Hoover before he went out of office admitted, that the tragic conditions that confronted him were the heritage of war.

The Senator from Idaho has said that this is not a measure to preserve neutrality; that it is a measure to insure peace. I am happy to accept that phase of it.

Mr. BORAH. I said it was a measure designed to keep us out of war.

Mr. BONE. I think almost any price we can pay to keep out of war is worth while; for the next war, if it takes in as many nations as the last, will probably destroy our civilization.

May I intrude just a little longer? Then I will not bother the Senator further.

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BONE. When the Munitions Committee of the Senate was inquiring of a number of very able gentlemen their opinion as to what would happen to our western civilization if another great international conflict should come on, without a single exception these outstanding men—I might name some of them: Patrick Hurley; Eugene Grace; Mr. Carse, of Electric Boat; Mr. Morgan and some of his associates—without a single exception those men said, in substance, "It is my judgment that if the world becomes embroiled in another great international conflict, that conflict will probably destroy our civilization."

I do not believe any human being in this body wants to pay that price in order to preserve this illusory thing called trade. If, as the Senator says, the preservation of our national honor and our economic interests can be achieved only at the price of the destruction of our civilization, in God's name it is not worth it. Anything we could do to prevent that would certainly be a desirable alternative.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator. If we can preserve peace upon any reasonable basis, we ought to preserve peace, but what I have been trying to show, and what I evidently have not succeeded in showing in the opinion of the able Senator from Washington, is that in my opinion these two sections do not contribute to peace, and in my opinion they do not diminish the profits of war, and in my opinion they do not take care of the gentlemen whom the Senator has been so long investigating. The Senator begs the proposition when he says the measure does that thing. I may be entirely in error, but what I am arguing is that the measure does not accomplish that fact.

Mr. BONE. We now have pending a tax bill that would answer the question of war profits, that would take somewhere around 99 percent of the profits, and put a ceiling on profits. There would be no war profits if the thing the Munitions Committee has suggested should become the law of the land. There just would not be any such thing as war profits.

Mr. BORAH. Then it will not become the law of the land.

Mr. BONE. I am becoming painfully aware of that fact.

Mr. BORAH. In discussing these matters I think we have given too much credence to the theory that we were drawn into the World War by reason of our trade and our trade embroilment. Undoubtedly it was a contributing factor; but I have never had any doubt but that we would have been in the World War regardless of submarine warfare and regardless of our troubles in regard to trade. We were not neutral in mind or thought for longer than about 60 days after the World War started. We thought Germany represented a civilization which was in conflict with our civilization. We thought Germany represented a system which was at war with our system; and as the war went on we became convinced that it was a fight for the preservation of civilization. Whether rightly or wrongly we rapidly reached the conclusion that two philosophies of life were fighting for supremacy. If matters had gotten to the point where the Allies were being defeated, in my opinion the United States would have gone into the World War in what it would have called self-defense, regardless of any question of dollars and cents and trade.

Woodrow Wilson said after the war was over, when appearing before the Foreign Relations Committee, we would have gone into the war regardless of submarines and regardless of trade and commerce. It was one of the things that seemed bound to come. The trade factors I have mentioned contributed to bringing us into the war but were not the only contributing causes. Therefore, when we meet that situation in the future I want the Nation to be as economically powerful as possible; and I do not believe we ought to give up our substantial and essential rights in trade and commerce in order to meet another world war. I think we should weaken ourselves in that respect if we did so.

Another thing, someone is going to carry this trade, someone is going to do this business, someone is going to carry this commerce. One of the great moving plans of the belligerents always is to break down neutral trade and take it to itself. Thomas Jefferson called attention, early in the beginning of his administration, to the fact that one of the objects of belligerents was not only to win the war but to destroy the trade of neutrals and to draw that trade of the neutrals to themselves.

We know that in the World War one of the great belligerents, after protesting against our selling goods to neutrals, itself furnished to neutrals those goods which it had purchased from the United States. It was transferring the trade from the channels between the United States and the neutrals to trade between its country and the neutrals; and that is always one of the objects of belligerents in war.

Mr. President, I am not in favor of giving up our legitimate trade; I am not in favor of surrendering the trade in those things which are necessary for human comfort, human existence, human life. I am not in favor of getting off the seas in the carrying of those things which are essential for the preservation of civilization. I do not think it contributes to peace, and I am sure it does not contribute to our national welfare.

We are now engaged in building up our foreign trade. It is the theme of the hour. It is proposed that we do this not only in the interest of our national welfare, but in the interest of peace among the nations. It seems to me that along with the program of building up a permanent foreign trade must go the open, pronounced, and determined program to protect that trade and to protect those who put their money and their energy and their efforts into that trade.

Our domestic welfare and our domestic trade are dependent in large measure upon business on the sea, and when we surrender the latter we inevitably imperil the former.

Why is it that Great Britain has maintained her powerful foreign trade? It is because when her trade is interfered with the British Navy moves to the point upon the globe where the interference occurs. If we indicate our willingness to get off the sea, there is standing ready at hand a great nation prepared to establish her dominancy of the sea, and that would be of incalculable injury to us, both in time of peace and in time of war.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I cannot bring myself to believe that Britain's control of sea lanes has contributed greatly to the welfare of the average Briton. I doubt if there is any country in Europe where poverty is more dismal than in Great Britain. It may be that Great Britain is powerful, that she is mistress of the seas; but she has had millions of her people on the dole, and her control of the sea lanes certainly has not added anything to the happiness of her people. The most she has done has been to keep them on a level of poverty that is a disgrace.

Mr. BORAH. Where would Great Britain be if she had not done what I have stated? There would not be any Great Britain.

Mr. President, I have spoken longer than I had intended. I say again that I have regretted that I have had to differ with the able chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations about these two propositions. He has worked zealously, he has worked earnestly, he has worked patiently and ably to bring out a bill. But the two provisions to which I have referred would work a change in our national policy. It is a matter of profound significance. I did not feel that I ought to vote against them without explaining my reasons for so doing, and I did not feel that I could vote for them. I have, therefore, submitted my views for the consideration and I trust the favorable consideration of my colleagues.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I desire to discuss briefly the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], but before doing so I wish to make two general observations in reference to the proposed law itself.

I very heartily approve the proposed legislation, and I think the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations has performed a remarkable piece of work in the way he has whipped the joint resolution into shape for presentation. However, I have a feeling, which is derived from what I read in my mail and what I read of discussions in magazines and newspapers, that there are many people who think that by the mere act of passing the proposed legislation we are going to prevent our country becoming involved in another war.

I agree with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that we cannot avoid involvement in a world war by the simple process of keeping our fingers crossed. We cannot by just saying that we are going to prevent war traffic and war trade assure ourselves or assure our people that we are going to stay out of war. I sincerely hope it will not be the effort of Members of this body to attempt to convince the people that by the enactment of the proposed legislation we will guarantee our country against war. I entertain that hope because if the people did have that sort of an impression, that in itself would be a distinct danger to the future of the country.

Since we cannot, by such legislation as that proposed, or any act of Congress, keep ourselves out of war, it is my belief that this Government and this Nation should do everything possible to lessen the possibilities of war throughout the world. By that I do not mean through any political alinement; I do not mean by any international arrangements whereby we would enter into any international organization. I do mean that we should do so by attempting in every way possible, by lessening the restrictions upon the channels of trade throughout the world, to break down the economic barriers to trade, thereby lessening the needs of the nations of Europe which might engage in war, and thereby lessening the possibilities of war in Europe itself.

I wish to make a second observation. It seems to me the mere fact that the distinguished Senator from Michigan, who during the years has been so much in favor of neutrality legislation, and who entertains a sincere desire to work out neutrality legislation, may be in disagreement with some of us as to the effect of portions of the pending measure, is in itself proof of the difficulties involved in the enactment of neutrality legislation.

I have the feeling that 2 or 3 years ago there were many people in this country who thought that the adoption of neutrality legislation was a simple task, that we could take half a day off and nobody would disagree, that all we had to do was merely declare ourselves neutral and pass some measure to that effect and that everything would be easy. I hope those who had that point of view have found that there are other problems involved in the enactment of neutrality legislation than those which at first appeared so easy of solution.

What the Senator from Michigan proposes to do is to strike out that portion of the pending joint resolution which would give to the President, in the event he believed that the shipment upon American vessels of certain articles would endanger the security, the peace, or the neutrality of the United States, the power to prevent those goods from being shipped upon American vessels.

As the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations pointed out, there is nothing in the paragraph which the Senator from Michigan seeks to strike out which would say to any nation, "You may have this particular kind of goods if you are in a position to come here and take it away, and pay for it before you take it." The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] pointed out, as his objection to this provision, the fact that it would mean that the nations with the largest navies would be the only ones that could come and get their goods, because they are the only ones that could protect the ships upon which the goods were being transported. I think it is fair and I think it is logical to conclude from that statement that if it be true so far as other nations are concerned, then we may reasonably expect that it might be necessary for us to use our navy for the purpose of protecting the vessels upon which the goods are being transported.

I desire to conclude by reading part of the provision of subsection (a) of section 2, which the Senator from Michigan seeks to strike out. It says:

> Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations as provided in section 1 of this act and he shall thereafter find that the placing of restrictions on the shipment of certain articles or materials in addition to arms, ammunition, and implements of war from the United States to said belligerents named in the proclamation issued under said section 1, or to a country wherein civil strife has been proclaimed to exist, is deemed necessary to promote the security or preserve the peace or neutrality of the United States or to protect the lives and commerce of nationals of the United States, he shall so proclaim and it shall thereafter be unlawful for any American vessel or aircraft to carry such articles or materials to any belligerent—

Personally I cannot help but believe that that provision strengthens the resolution; it adds to our position of neutrality; and while I do not like to disagree upon this particular subject with the Senator from Michigan, I believe that to adopt his amendment would result in lessening the powers of the resolution, and in the event of war would take away from the President and from the Government a strong instrumentality to prevent our being drawn into war.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations a question. I do not know whether I understand section 4 correctly. It reads:

SEC. 4. This act shall not apply to an American republic or republics engaged in war against a non-American state or states, provided the American republic is not cooperating with a non-American state or states in such war.

Perhaps I may explain more clearly what I have in mind if I give an example and ask the Senator if I am correct in my interpretation.

For example, suppose a South American state were at war with another state in South America, and a foreign country, not a South American state, should take sides with one of the belligerents, and then another foreign country, not a South American state, should take sides with the other belligerent, and the result finally should be that the two European states were at war and the two South American states were at war: Under those circumstances, as I read article 4, the proviso about embargo in this resolution would then be effective. Is that correct?

Mr. PITTMAN. Does the Senator mean that this section would go into effect if that kind of a war should take place?

Mr. GERRY. With that sort of a war, under section 4, this resolution would be effective even in connection with a South American state.

Mr. PITTMAN. This is the old statute, the existing law; and it is very hard to follow the complicated suggestion made by the Senator that one foreign nation is helping one of the states in South America, and another foreign nation is helping another of the states in South America. Is that the way the Senator stated the proposition?

Mr. GERRY. Perhaps I can make it simpler.

For example, there might be a situation, possibly like in Spain, where it is alleged that one foreign nation is aiding one belligerent and another foreign nation is aiding another belligerent. Of course, that is a case of civil war; but I can well see that there might be a situation where two South American states were at war, and then one foreign country, a nation outside of South America, would aid one of the South American countries and another foreign country would aid the other South American country.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then the embargo would go into effect under my construction of the joint resolution.

Mr. GERRY. Then the embargo would go into effect, according to the Senator's construction?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. GERRY. That is the way I read it, and that was my construction of it.

Mr. PITTMAN. If either country conspired with an outside country, the embargo would go into effect.

Mr. GERRY. Then questions would arise under the old Monroe Doctrine policy, because if a foreign country should join with one South American state and defeat the other, that foreign country would undoubtedly have a tremendous influence in that South American country.

Mr. PITTMAN. That matter is not treated in the joint resolution.

Mr. GERRY. But it is proposed to put on an embargo, so that in that case we could not interfere.

Mr. PITTMAN. We could send our Navy down there.

Mr. GERRY. We could not send that country any war munitions. Cotton might be on the list, and we could not then send cotton.

Mr. PITTMAN. I know; but we should not have to send anything to anybody in a case like that. We could declare that a condition of war existed.

Mr. GERRY. It could be declared that a condition of war existed, but before it was declared that a condition of war existed the country in question might have been allowed to be occupied.

Mr. PITTMAN. Not necessarily.

Mr. GERRY. Not necessarily; but we certainly should not be doing them any good by refusing to ship them cotton or anything else.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not know whether we should be accomplishing any good if we sent arms, ammunition, and munitions of war to one side, and some European country sent the same materials to the other side.

Mr. GERRY. I know; but I am saying we again have a condition that comes down to the need of a big navy; and what I am worrying about is that all these resolutions will not necessarily keep us out of war. Personally, I do not believe there is a United States Senator who does not agree that the most important thing that can be done, if compatible with national honor, is to keep the country out of war; and all these propositions that have been made should be given every consideration. There is no question of the absolutely tireless work that Senators have devoted to this subject, with the most patriotic motives. The only question to my mind is that when we have before us a question as large as this, with all its ramifications, we do not know, when we change established custom, as we do when we give up the freedom of the seas, whether we incur a greater risk of getting into war than we did by sticking to the freedom of the seas. That is what I have been afraid of.

For example, as soon as we change the law in regard to blockades we are likely to bring the war closer to home. I am afraid of that. We are likely to create blockades which will be close to our American shores, as the Senator from Idaho has well pointed out, so that it will be even more difficult to keep us out of war than if the danger of war resulted from blockading a foreign state a good many thousand miles away. The nearer we get to home, the greater our danger. Then, of course, we have another question—that so far as concerns international law, the decision with respect to the question as to what is neutral and what is not neutral is not solely up to us. Different constructions may be placed upon it by the belligerent nations, and they try to enforce their construction.

Personally, my feeling is that eventually we get down to one proposition, that no matter what one of these various theories and programs we may favor—and we are all in favor, as I said before, of trying to prevent America from getting into war—I think we are all agreed, as was said here on the floor, that another great world war might very well mean the end of civilization; but when we really come down to the fundamental proposition, we must rely on the force and strength of the Nation's Navy. If the last 20 years have taught us anything they have taught us that the world is not thinking in terms of agreements but is thinking in terms of power, and the power today to enforce neutrality for our country is a great navy. I am entirely in sympathy with the President's attitude toward the Navy and approve the manner in which he has been trying to build it up. He realizes and knows well what the Navy can do not only in war but to maintain peace.

We are not the only nation that has in mind the thought of a navy. All the countries of the world today are thinking in terms of sea power. Japan refused to enter into an agreement last year because she wanted to increase her naval strength. Great Britain has built her Navy pretty well up to treaty strength, but she is now proposing to spend something like $7,000,000,000 more in defense of the country.

Eactly how much of that great sum will be allocated to the Navy of Great Britain it is difficult to say, but I assume it will be probably between three and four billion dollars. Undoubtedly, because of the peculiar situation of her island, Great Britain is going to spend a large amount for airplane construction. Her naval construction, however, will have a profound effect on the situation which exists today in regard to the comparative naval strength of Great Britain and the United States.

The parallel showing where the respective navies stand today is interesting, and I ask unanimous consent, instead of reading it, to have it inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The following data show the comparative status in combatant ships of the United States and British Navies brought up to March 1, 1937. You will note that the first table shows only underage vessels on hand, those of first-class military value. To show those overage and consequently of reduced value, a supplementary table is added.

Also, columns show, respectively, (1) vessels building or appropriated for; and (2) those projected—for the United States in the 1938 Budget, for Great Britain in the recently announced program, commencing April 1, 1937; (3) totals of these new vessels thus in prospect.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, the outstanding fact, to my mind, is that even with the naval building program which we expect to carry out, and Great Britain's formerly announced Navy program, Great Britain now expects to spend a great many billion dollars more on her Navy. So I say that, no matter what neutrality measure the Congress may enact with the idea of keeping us out of war, if we do not wish to incur great risk, the sane, sound, and sensible thing to do is to assure the completion of a building program that will give us a navy second to none.

Fundamentally the only way, in these days, to prevent aggression against a country's shores is to be so strong that no nation dares to make an attack. My own feeling is, and always has been, that if our Navy had been sufficiently powerful during the World War very likely we might not have become embroiled in that conflict. I still feel that a time may come, as the Senator from Idaho has so well said, when a nation may have to fight. A man who is not willing to fight for anything on this earth or in the next world is not worth very much, and a nation that has no soul is not going to have respect or safety from the world. America is not going to be such a nation, because, when the time comes, I think there are no people who rise more to their ideals than do the American people; and when they believe their cause is right, they are willing to fight.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the so-called Vandenberg amendment at this time, but I wish to take the opportunity of calling attention to some amendments which I propose to offer tomorrow. Most of them relate only to matters of form; most of them are not important; but I feel that they are of sufficient importance to merit the attention of the chairman of the committee and of the Senate.

The first one will be offered on page 6 of the joint resolution in lines 22 and 23. At that point I shall offer an amendment proposing to strike out the words "or possessions of the United States."

Mr. President, there is in the joint resolution a general definition, an all-inclusive definition, as I take it to be, of the words "United States." I think throughout the joint resolution we ought to adhere to that language. If, however, we are going to resort to particular words, as in this instance, where the joint resolution refers to the "United States, or possessions of the United States", we should be sure that enough words of particular description are used to reach what we have in mind. I am afraid this language, if adopted, will omit, for instance, Hawaii and Alaska from the scope of the measure.

If the chairman of the committee or if the Senate will agree to that suggestion, there would follow a number of other amendments of the same purport throughout the joint resolution.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, this question was raised in the committee.

Mr. WHITE. I thought it had been attended to.

Mr. PITTMAN. It has been attended to, and if the Senator from Maine believes that the general language is sufficiently broad, all that need be done is to strike out the other words.

Mr. WHITE. It seemed to me that the general language was broad enough to cover every contingency, and that reliance ought to be had on that general language. There are a number of places in the resolution where we could strike out words of the same purport.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is true.

Mr. WHITE. The next amendment is of even less consequence, and if this were a measure of interest only to the United States I should not think of calling it to the attention of the Senate, but here is a piece of proposed legislation which I take it as of great concern to the rest of the world.

On page 9, in line 4, I would suggest that we strike out the word "American", and after the word "aircraft" insert the words "of the United States", so it would read:

It shall thereafter be unlawful for any vessel or aircraft of the United States—

And so forth. As a matter of fact, every one of the republics of South America is as much entitled to use the word "American" as are we of the United States. I think it is a more accurate description if we speak of "the vessels and the aircraft of the United States" than if we refer only to "American vessels or aircraft." That may not be of very much importance, but I think, as a matter of description, it improves the joint resolution. The same suggestion will be found to be applicable in a number of places throughout the text. I invite the attention of the chairman of the committee to it, so he may consider it during the recess or adjournment of the Senate.

On page 9, in line 3, I think there should be an amendment after the word "proclaim." The language is, "he shall so proclaim." I think after the word "proclaim" there should be inserted language substantially as follows:

And shall definitely enumerate in said proclamation the articles or materials the shipment of which the President finds it necessary, for the purposes of this section, to restrict.

In the preceding section of the joint resolution it is specifically provided, with respect to arms, munitions, and implements of war, that the President shall specifically enumerate what comes within the general definition. I think it would be well to insert at the point suggested the statement that there should be some sort of enumeration of the additional articles and materials. I suggest that to the chairman for his consideration.

On page 11, in line 6, after the word "government", I think there should be inserted, if not these identical words, something of this sort: "Or of any section or group engaged in such civil strife or of any representative thereof or of any persons participating therein."

It seems to me, as the language now stands, we reach only one party to a civil controversy and that we ought to expand it if we are going to do the thing at all, so that it will reach all parties to the civil strife and prevent the encouragement of the strife by financial help rendered to any party to it. I think that amendment really is important. The others, as I have said, are merely matters of form.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, it is very difficult to frame just exactly what we want in this way. When we have recognized a belligerent government as the de facto government, it comes within the inhibition of the joint resolution about lending money to belligerents.

Mr. WHITE. This has reference not to a belligerent nation but to civil strife and the parties to civil strife.

Mr. PITTMAN. In the case of civil strife, as a general thing we have recognized the government of the country preceding the strife, and we have been very careful not to proceed to recognize another faction immediately afterward.

Mr. WHITE. I think having a prohibition against making loans to any participant in a civil strife would not involve the recognition of any of the contending parties other than the de facto or the de jure government.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEE in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations (and withdrawing a nomination), which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received and nomination withdrawn, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. NEELY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Harry E. Watkins, of Fairmont, W. Va, to be United States district judge for the State of West Virginia, to fill an existing vacancy.

Mr. O'MAHONEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Carl McFarland, of Montana, to be an Assistant Attorney General of the United States, vice Harry W. Blair, resigned.

Mr. HUGHES, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Joseph C. Reing, of Pennsylvania, to be United States marshal for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, vice Joseph B. Reing, deceased.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state in order the nominations on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Donald Wakefield Smith, of Pennsylvania, to be a member of the National Labor Relations Board for the unexpired portion of the term of 3 years from August 27, 1935.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

IN THE ARMY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Army.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that nominations in the Army be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Army nominations are confirmed en bloc. That completes the executive calendar.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE STUBBS, OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate resume legislative session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEE in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 142

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
March 1, 1937.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. HENRY E. STUBBS, a Representative from the State of California.

Resolved, That a committee of four Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I send to the desk resolutions which I ask to have read and immediately considered.

The resolutions (S. Res. 88) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. HENRY E. STUBBS, late a Representative from the State of California.

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As members of the committee on the part of the Senate, the Chair appoints the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and the junior Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO].

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, March 2, 1937, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, MARCH 1, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Praise the Lord, O Jerusalem, praise thy God, O Zion. His word runneth very swiftly. Heavenly Father, we pray that we may start down the path of this new week with the majesty of a clear conscience sweeping through our beings. Pondering God and that inner voice, which is the eye of the soul, we shall not wander in the forbidden ways checkered by light and shadow. Thus armed, gracious Lord, we shall be restrained from that which is wrong, and the way of truth, wisdom, and right shall be pointed out. Do Thou enhance in us the real value of self and help us to measure up to the highest ideals of manhood. May we be made worthy of Thy approbation and the approval of our fellow men. We breathe an earnest prayer for our Speaker and for all who are associated with these historic walls. With increasing faith in the right, may we be fully prepared to enter upon our labors.

Again, blessed Lord, we are in the valley. The shadows hover low. Another distinguished Member has left us, faithful in his public service and upright in his private life.

Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil for Thou art with me. Thy rod and Thy staff they comfort me.

We thank Thee for these undying words. Through Christ, Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, February 25, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on the following dates the President approved and signed a bill and joint resolutions of the House of the following titles:

On February 23, 1937:

H. R. 3112. An act for the relief of Ralph C. Irwin.

On February 24, 1937:

H. J. Res. 229. Joint resolution to make funds available for health and sanitation activities in the areas recently stricken by floods.

On February 27, 1937:

H. J. Res. 212. Joint resolution to amend the act entitled "An act to levy an excise tax upon carriers and an income tax upon their employees, and for other purposes", approved August 29, 1935.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 2518 An act to provide for retirement of Justices of the Supreme Court; and

H. J. Res. 96. Joint resolution to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

THE LATE ANDREW R. BRODBECK

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes to make an announcement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Speaker, I regret to announce the death of a former Member of this body, Hon. Andrew R. Brodbeck, who served here in the Sixty-third and Sixty-fifth Congresses from the district that I now have the honor to represent. Mr. Brodbeck was my friend, and in his passing I have lost someone for whom I had the greatest respect and regard. The community in which he lived and served will miss him, for he was most diligent in promoting the welfare of the people with whom he labored and toiled for so many years. A leader in both the religious and civic life of the community, a sympathetic gentleman for all who needed sympathy, a liberal thinker, and a philanthropist. He was always trying to do a good turn for others, and in the recent years, after having retired from active business, he delighted most in serving others in an humble manner that won for him the confidence and respect he so richly deserved. As a Member of this body he was intensely interested in his people. He served here during those trying days of the World War, and it was during that period that I learned to know him best.

Tolerant toward his fellow man and yet a gentleman of firm convictions. If he thought he was right, he was determined to pursue that course; but if shown to be wrong, he was equally willing to admit it. The country can little afford to lose men like this gentleman and I am confident that in saying this I merely express the sentiment that a great host of his neighbors and friends would express. Born of a fine parentage in an humble York County home in 1860, by sacrifice and a determination that would not be denied, he acquired an education that led him to the schoolroom as a teacher in the public schools of his own community.

His contribution to the boys and girls of his day is so valuable that no one can appraise it, but it has been my privilege to speak to men and women who knew him as a school teacher and who today will testify as to his influence in their own lives for better living. He chose Hanover, Pa., as his home, just a few miles over the hill from his birthplace at Jefferson.

It is here that everyone knew "Andy", as he was lovingly called. He is going to be missed in church, for he was loyal to the church of his choice and contributed most liberally not only to his own church but to many others. He gave a fortune away to further the cause of education, and has had erected monuments that will stand as a lasting memorial to the fine spirit that characterized his living; but better still, he has erected monuments more glorious in the memory of those who knew him best. He was a devoted husband. A few years ago his helpmate of many years was laid to rest and now he goes to join her in that land "from whose bourne no traveler has ever returned." I am sure that the type of materials he sent on ahead will have prepared for him mansions in that everlasting city of God. He was a kind, loving father to his daughters, who survive him, and who have the many fine qualities of the parents. I deeply regret his passing, for to me he was more than a friend—he was a good man. God give us more like him.

THE LATE REUEL SMALL

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes and to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Maine, Mr. OLIVER, in that time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, it seems appropriate that we should pause for a moment this morning to permit a tribute to be paid to one who had been in the service of this House for 39 years.

Reuel Small, formerly of Maine, served as a reporter of debates in this House throughout that extraordinary length of time, coming here first while Speaker Reed was in the chair, and known to many of you by reason of the intimacies born of associations within this Hall. Not only as a Member of the Maine delegation but as one who also observed his services here upon the floor, I want to pay tribute to the record of his life. I ask that the Representative in Congress from the congressional district of Speaker Reed and of Mr. Small, Mr. OLIVER, here be permitted to pay fitting tribute to the record of his life. I yield the balance of my time to my colleague, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. OLIVER], and ask unanimous consent that we may be permitted to revise and extend our remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my sad duty to make a few remarks concerning the death of one who has been a faithful servant of this Government for many years.

On February 27 Reuel Small, a personal friend of many of this House, died. As dean of the House reporters he served conscientiously and well; as a friend his passing will be deeply regretted by all those with whom he has been associated for more than 39 years in this body.

Mr. Small was born in Newry, Maine, a small town in the First Congressional District, graduating from Norwich College in 1866. He was further honored with an M. S. degree in 1911.

His very noteworthy service rendered in this House for so many years was initiated in the Maine State Senate in 1863 and 1869 where he was the official reporter for that legislative group and later he served as court reporter for the superior court of Cumberland County. The State Department in 1889 recognized his ability by sending him as official reporter in the case of American fishing vessels seized by Canada for violation of Dominion fishing laws. In 1896 he was sent again by the State Department to report the minutes of the Bering Sea Claims Commission. In 1898 another of Maine's illustrious sons, Thomas B. Reed, the then Speaker of this House, appointed him as Official Reporter for the membership of this body. In this position from 1898 until about a week ago he had served the Members of the House of Representatives faithfully and well and it is with deep and profound regret that we note his passing.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, the mantle which, as he left this Hall a few days ago, distinguished Reuel H. Small as the oldest living graduate of Norwich University, the military college of the State of Vermont, has fallen from his shoulders. He wore it unsullied, with honor and distinction, and as became a man.

One day last week he went out of here never to return; his task accomplished, the long day done as the shadows lengthened, evening came, and he reached his journey's end, dying, as he had lived, like a soldier.

Those of us who have observed him engaged in his work find it difficult to realize and to appreciate the fact that he was in his ninetieth year. As Dryden says in Oedipus:

> Fate seemed to wind him up for fourscore years;
> Yet freshly ran he on 10 winters more
> Till like a clock worn out with eating time
> The wheels of weary life at last stood still.

For 39 years he walked among those who found their duty in this Hall and most effectively and efficiently discharged the duties of official reporter of debates.

It was given to some of us to know him intimately, and we could but remark how clear his mind and how wonderful his memory of men and events. He was a veritable storehouse of information and reminiscence; inclined to be reticent, nevertheless a most interesting conversationalist and a versatile and very able man.

He liked to talk about his boyhood days and to live again in retrospection the hours he spent as college classmate of William Rutherford Mead, the artist and architect; Edward Dean Adams, the philanthropist and distinguished engineer; Admiral George H. Converse, United States Navy; and Rear Admiral Colvocoresses, who was with Admiral Dewey on the Olympia at the Battle of Manila.

Mr. Small was particularly pleased to have occupied at Norwich University the room on the door of the closet of which there was burned into the woodwork these words:

> This is George Dewey's room, N. U. '55.

He believed himself to be the sole survivor of that group of cadets who under General Jackman rendered important service to the State of Vermont during the excitement incident to the St. Albans raid of October 19, 1864. In the roster of that force the name of Reuel Small appears as "corporal." "There was no question", he said, laughingly, as he talked to me from his desk here, "but that the 35 or 40 of us who went to Newport as volunteers"—and, by the way, he said "every single cadet offered his services"—"there is no question", he said, "but that we saved the country."

The fact is, historically speaking, this volunteer organization was not a part of the militia or of any organized force and was "never mustered into anything by anybody."

On August 2, 1866, Reuel Small graduated from Norwich University and delivered one of the commencement orations. His remarkable career and the valuable service which he has rendered his country since is a matter of public record.

He was born September 22, 1847.

> We spend our years as a tale that is told.

THE NEUTRALITY BILL

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to submit minority views on the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 242) to maintain the neutrality of the United States in the event of war between or among foreign nations, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday next, March 3, after the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table I may be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I must object because that is Calendar Wednesday, and we want to protect it. One gentleman who wanted to speak next week was willing to come in after the call of the Private Calendar tomorrow. I would have no objection to that, but I would be compelled to object to Wednesday, because it is such an important day, and we should not begin taking time off of Calendar Wednesday. The gentleman from Michigan, I am sure, knows that I regret very much to object to any request he makes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I desire to amend my request and ask that I may be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes on Thursday next, after the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, in all probability the naval appropriation bill will be up that day. Would the gentleman be willing to get his time in general debate?

Mr. WOODRUFF. If the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Speaker, can assure the gentleman from Michigan that he can secure for him 30 minutes in general debate on the naval bill, that will be perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. RAYBURN. I will say to the gentleman that if he will withdraw his request entirely, I shall try to work that out and let him know in time to renew his request before Thursday.

Mr. WOODRUFF. That is agreeable, and I withdraw the request, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

THE NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Speaker, the naval appropriation bill was scheduled to come onto the floor last Thursday. Before that time a number of Members endeavored to get copies of the bill, copies of the report, or copies of the hearings, and failed. Due to a lamentable circumstance, consideration of that bill was postponed until Thursday of this week and, again, Members have made efforts to secure copies of the bill, of the report, or of the hearings, and have failed.

I take it for granted this bill will come onto the floor, as every other Navy or Army appropriation bill has come here during my time, and no Members aside from members of the Appropriations Committee will know one single thing about the bill until it comes onto the floor.

I have asked for this time to protest against this kind of procedure.

The Budget for 1938, I believe, asks for more than $560,000,000 for the Navy, and I presume the Army will ask for enough more to make the total well over $1,000,000,000, and the practical result of the procedure we have followed for a long time is to have these enormous appropriation bills passed without any consideration whatsoever by the House as a body.

Out in Iowa we think we are pretty rich on account of the hogs we raise. I was interested in looking up the figures the other day and I discovered from the Department of Agriculture that all the hogs in the United States, as of January 1, 1937, are worth $508,000,000; in other words, next Thursday we will be asked to appropriate for the Navy $50,000,000 more than the worth of the entire hog crop of the United States, and to do this without any reasonable consideration at all by this House.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. If I have time, I will yield to the gentleman.

We talk in this body about economy. I believe in economy. I would like to vote to cut these appropriations and to cut the personnel of many Government departments and agencies, but there is no use talking about economy unless we strike the places where the biggest expenditures are made. For the fiscal year 1936, past and future wars cost this Government more than $4,000,000,000, and how many Members on this floor and how many of the newspapers that talk about economy say anything about these items? There is no use talking about economy if we do not talk about the largest expenditures. I do not believe we are going to get any rational consideration of these enormous "outgoes" unless we change the procedure so that the membership of this House will have at least an opportunity to read an appropriation bill, at least an opportunity to read the report, or at least an opportunity to glance over the hearings a little while before the bill comes to the floor of this House. [Applause.]

I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I simply wanted to inquire of the gentleman from Iowa whether his metaphor with respect to hogs bore any relationship to the Army and the Navy and what they get out of the Government.

Mr. BIERMANN. I would dislike to put into the RECORD what I think about some of these men, but I will say that I never heard of an Army or Navy officer advocating any substantial cut in any kind of appropriation for them. I never heard of an Army or naval high-command official allowing one of lower rank to submit any testimony that might indicate where some savings may be made, without disciplining that Army or Navy officer.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. Yes.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I recall that a week ago I inquired as to whether this report would be out for the benefit of the Members who, like myself, are interested, and I was informed that the subcommittee chairman of the Committee on Appropriations had informed our leader that it would be out last Wednesday or Thursday. Last Wednesday and Thursday have passed, and we find the gentleman from Iowa now on the floor demanding something that was promised last week. I cannot understand the situation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KOPPLEMANN] says he does not understand the situation. I violated no promise that I made. When the untimely death of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations occurred the Subcommittee on Naval Appropriations said they did not want to bring up their bill until later, and that is the reason why the bill did not come up and why it was not taken up last Thursday.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has misunderstood me. I repeated the gentleman's statement as coming from the chairman of the subcommittee, that he had promised the gentleman from Texas that it would be out last Wednesday or Thursday.

Mr. RAYBURN. And it would have been, if it had not been for the death of Mr. Buchanan.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. But Mr. Buchanan's lamentable death did not stop the subcommittee from reporting its provisions, or reporting out this measure, did it?

Mr. RAYBURN. That was the answer given to me.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I do not share the criticism of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BIERMANN] has voiced against the Committee on Appropriations in respect to the naval appropriation bill, or any of the Appropriations Committee bills, but I do endorse in toto what he has had to say with reference to the procedure. I for one am of opinion that the membership of the House should at least have a reasonable opportunity to examine the appropriation bills and the hearings, and for that reason I am today introducing a resolution to change the rule requiring an appropriation bill to be on the calendar for 5 days before it can be considered by the House. In other words, the Committee on Appropriations is charged with the expenditure of $10,000,000,000. As a rule an appropriation bill is introduced and debate upon it takes place the same day. The average Member of the House is not conversant with practically anything that is in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress, report of the Committee on Panama Canal Tolls and Vessel Measurement Rules, appointed under the provisions of the act approved April 13, 1936, "for the purpose of making an independent study and investigation of the rules for the measurement of vessels using the Panama Canal and the tolls that should be charged therefor." As provided by law, the report contains the Committee's "advisory recommendations of changes and modifications of the rules for the measurement of vessels for the Panama Canal and the determination of tolls as it finds necessary or desirable to provide a practical, just and equitable system of measuring such vessels and levying such tolls."

For over 20 years, numerous attempts have been made to secure the enactment of legislation which would abolish the dual system of measurement whereby tolls are computed under one set of rules, with a limiting factor on the amount to be collected, determined by different and continually changing rules of measurement over which the President has no jurisdiction.

The Committee points out in its report that the Panama Canal Act of 1912 clearly intended to provide that the President should be given full authority to prescribe rules for the measurement of vessels at the Panama Canal, and to fix within certain well-defined limits prescribed by the Congress toll rates that were to be charged on vessels passing through the Canal. Due to the effect of the Attorney General's interpretation made in 1914 of the requirements of the Panama Canal Act, not only has the average transit charge per vessel, foreign and American, been much lowered, and the total revenues of the Canal correspondingly reduced, but the transit payments made for vessels of like earning capacity have become widely different; and this has taken place without any change in the rate of tolls fixed by the President to be paid by all types of commercial vessels, and without any modification of the rules prescribed by the President for determining the tonnage upon which the established rate of tolls should be paid.

It was not intended that the Panama Canal Rules, prescribed by the President in 1913, should forever remain unchanged, nor was it intended that the toll rates should remain fixed at the rates prescribed by the President in 1912. With development in ship construction and increases in traffic the time has come when the rules should be modified and the rates reduced. This cannot be accomplished in a satisfactory and impartial manner without the enactment of remedial legislation abolishing the dual system and establishing the Panama Canal Rules of Measurement as the sole rules for the measurement of vessels at the Panama Canal, and the tonnage on which Congress should prescribe the limits within which the President may act in fixing the toll rates.

An effort was made at the last session of the Congress to secure the enactment of such legislation, but there were those who felt that an independent study of the entire subject should be made first by a neutral committee before final action was taken. That study has now been made and an exhaustive report has been submitted.

The Committee has made certain recommendations as to the enactment of necessary legislation which I approve. Its enactment will permit the President to proceed administratively to carry out the further recommendations of the Committee as to the modifications of the rules and the rates to be charged, in order to provide a practical, just, and equitable system of measuring vessels and levying tolls.

I cannot urge too strongly the enactment of legislation that will so amend existing law as to provide:

(1) That tolls for the use of the Panama Canal shall be based upon vessel tonnage determined by the Panama Canal rules of measurement as prescribed by the President.

(2) That the tolls upon commercial vehicles, Army and Navy transports, colliers, supply and hospital ships shall not exceed $1 per Panama Canal net ton, and shall not be less than 75 cents per Panama Canal net ton, when such vessels are laden.

(3) That a rate of tolls lower than is levied on laden vessels may be prescribed for vessels in ballast, without passengers or cargo.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 26, 1937.

SUGAR-QUOTA SYSTEM (H. DOC. NO. 156)

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message of the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

The expiration on December 31, 1937, of the quota provisions of the Jones-Costigan Act and Public Resolution No. 109 of June 19, 1936, and the existence of the public problems which have arisen as a result of discontinuance of the processing tax on sugar and benefit payments to sugar-beet and sugar-cane producers, make it desirable that the Congress consider the enactment of new legislation with respect to sugar. The Jones-Costigan Act has been useful and effective and it is my belief that its principles should again be made effective.

I therefore recommend to the Congress the enactment of the sugar quota system, and its necessary complements, which will restore the operation of the principles on which the Jones-Costigan Act was based. In order to accomplish this purpose adequate safeguards would be required to protect the interests of each group concerned. As a safeguard for the protection of consumers I recommend that provision be made to prevent any possible restriction of the supply of sugar that would result in prices to consumers in excess of those reasonably necessary, together with conditional payments to producers, to maintain the domestic industry as a whole and to make the production of sugar beets and sugar-cane as profitable as the production of the principal other agricultural crops. In order to protect the expansion of markets for American exports, I recommend that no decrease be made in the share of other countries in the total quotas.

It is also highly desirable to continue the policy, which was inherent in the Jones-Costigan Act, of effectuating the principle that an industry which desires the protection afforded by a quota system, or a tariff, should be expected to guarantee that it will be a good employer. I recommend, therefore, that the prevention of child labor, and the payment of wages of not less than minimum standards, be included among the conditions for receiving a Federal payment.

I recommend that adequate provision be made to protect the right of both new and old producers of small acreages of sugar beets and sugarcane to an equitable share of the benefits offered by the program. In this connection I suggest also that you consider the advisability of providing for payments at rates for family-size farms higher than those applicable to large operating units.

Quotas influence the price of sugar through the control of supply; consequently, under a quota regulation of the supply of sugar, a tax may be levied without causing any adverse effect, over a period of time, on the price paid by consumers.

I recommend to the Congress the enactment of an excise tax at the rate of not less than 0.75 cent per pound of sugar, raw value. I am definitely advised that such a tax would not increase the average cost of sugar to consumers. An excise tax of this amount would yield approximately $100,000,000 per annum to the Treasury of the United States, which would make the total revenue from sugar more nearly commensurate with that obtained during the period 1922–29. It is also estimated that the total income of foreign countries from the sale of sugar in the United States under the quota system would not be less than that obtained during 1935, and, like the total income of domestic sugar producers, it can be expected to increase in future years as our consumption requirements expand.

In considering the enactment of any tax the Congress has regard for its social and economic effects as well as its ability to raise revenue. The social and economic effects of an adequate excise tax on sugar are so important to the welfare of the various groups affected as to constitute a necessary complement to the quota system. For this reason I recommend that neither the quotas nor the tax should be operative alone.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 1, 1937.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DEMUTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mrs. HONEYMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that tomorrow, after the disposal of the regular business on the Speaker's desk, I be permitted to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. A previous request was made of this character, to address the House tomorrow, and it was granted after the conclusion of the consideration of the Private Calendar. I suggest that the gentlewoman from Oregon follow the same procedure.

Mrs. HONEYMAN. That is perfectly satisfactory, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman from Oregon modifies her request that she be permitted to address the House for 5 minutes tomorrow, after the disposition of matters on the Speaker's desk and the conclusion of the consideration of the Private Calendar and previous orders. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

STAR-ROUTE CONTRACTS

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 84, which gives to the Postmaster General 60 days additional time in the awarding of star-route contracts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. The gentleman's committee has the right-of-way on Calendar Wednesday. Why could it not be brought up at that time?

Mr. MEAD. Because tomorrow is the dead line on which the Postmaster General will have to award these contracts. The resolution will have to reach the White House today or it will be without value.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. This matter has been considered by your committee?

Mr. MEAD. It has been considered by our committee and amended in accordance with the suggestions of the Department.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. This will not change the present law?

Mr. MEAD. None whatever.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman why it is necessary or desirable that the time be extended. Is there any emergency that exists that would require such an operation?

Mr. MEAD. In answer to the gentleman, I may say that the Department, at the request of our committee, has made a report on the revision of existing star-route legislation, and it is anticipated that legislation will be considered by the House and Senate in the interim. Therefore, it is the unanimous desire of our committee that the Department be given this 60-day extension in which to award the new contracts.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. In other words, you want to continue the present status until your committee has time to consider the legislation?

Mr. MEAD. That is it, exactly.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to withhold the awarding of any star-route contract for a period of 60 days after March 31, 1937.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. MEAD: In line 4, after the word "of", strike out "any star-route contract" and insert "star-route contracts for which bids have been received in the first contract section"; and in line 5, strike out the figures "31" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "1."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MEAD. I move the previous question on the adoption of the Senate joint resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address by Hon. Charles Moore, Chairman of the Commission on Fine Arts, chiefly devoted to the beautification of Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, in view of the fact that we have been delayed about 45 minutes on the Consent Calendar and there are many Members who are interested in the bills, I feel I am forced to object to any further requests for time.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks, to include remarks made by me yesterday at a conference on social control of power called by the League of Industrial Democracy.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

AMENDING IMMIGRATION ACT OF FEBRUARY 5, 1917

The Clerk called the first bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 26, to amend section 23 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917 (39 Stat. 874), as amended (U. S. C., title 8, sec. 102).

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? Three objections are required.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. O'DAY] if this bill is exactly as it was passed last year? Are there any changes?

Mrs. O'DAY. None that I know of.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of section 23 of the act of February 5, 1917, as reads as follows: "and shall have authority to enter into contract for the support and relief of such aliens as may fall into distress or need public aid, and to remove to their native land, at any time within 3 years after entry, at the expense of the appropriations for the enforcement of this act", is amended to read as follows: "and shall have authority to enter into contract for the support and relief of such aliens as may fall into distress or need public aid, and to remove to their native country, or the country from whence they came, or to the country of which they are citizens or subjects, at any time after entry, at the expense of the appropriations for the enforcement of this act, such as fall into distress or need public aid from causes arising subsequent to their entry and are desirous of being so removed, but any person thus removed shall forever be ineligible for readmission except upon the approval of the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Labor."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DEPORTATION OF CERTAIN ALIENS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 28, to authorize the deportation of aliens who secured preference-quota or non-quota visas through fraud by contracting marriage solely to fraudulently expedite admission to the United States, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I notice in the report on this bill, on the first page, that this is identical in text to the bill H. R. 11040, of the Seventy-fourth Congress, which passed the House April 20, 1936. Then the report says:

Subsequent pressure for the enactment of more urgent legislation prevented its final enactment.

Can the lady from New York [Mrs. O'DAY] tell me what that subsequent pressure was? Why was this bill carried on from April 20, 1936, after it passed the House, and never considered in the Senate?

Mrs. O'DAY. Because the Senate adjourned before this and other bills could be considered.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. As I remember, the Senate did not adjourn until the end of June 1936. This bill was passed by us on the 20th of April. In view of the fact that I do not understand what that subsequent pressure was and the lady cannot inform me, I am going to ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

TEMPORARY STAY OF CERTAIN ALIENS, DEPORTATION OF CERTAIN ALIENS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 27, to authorize the shortening or termination of temporary stay in the United States of certain aliens not admitted for permanent residence, to authorize the deportation of certain aliens admitted for permanent residence, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve my objection to permit the gentleman to make a statement.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, this bill was unanimously reported by the committee after full hearing and determination.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is directed against groups of aliens who ostensibly come here for the purpose of visiting the country but who, as a matter of fact, are nothing but a lot of spies and propagandists who spread all forms of propaganda of foreign origin which is not for the best interests of this country. After an alien comes into this country and secures permission to stay here for 3 or 6 months, there is no way we can get him out of this country until the stay is terminated. This bill merely provides that if an individual who comes here in the guise of a visitor distributes propaganda of his government which is contrary to our Constitution and form of government, that we shall have the right to tell this visitor to take the next boat home.

The bill has the endorsement of many patriotic organizations. It has the endorsement of the committee. We have given it careful study. The Committee on Un-American Activities, of which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] was chairman, recommended such legislation in its last report.

It is the feeling of your committee that those foreigners who want to come to our country to visit for a while should be allowed to so long as they mind their own business; but when, for instance, they begin to stir up racial intolerance by foreign propaganda, they should be deported, and at the present time we have no way of getting them out of the country.

I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania can see his way clear to withdraw his objection. The committee worked very hard on this bill. The Committee on Un-American Activities made this recommendation in its report. The purpose of the bill is simply to rid this country of men and women who come here for no other purpose than the spreading of this form of propaganda.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

As I remember, this bill came before the House last year, did it not?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. It did.

Mr JENKINS of Ohio. Was it passed by the House?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. It was passed unanimously under a rule, although it had been objected to for a year and a half before that time.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The gentleman says it was passed unanimously under a rule?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes; there was not a vote against it.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Were any amendments adopted at that time? Does this bill represent the bill as it came from the committee or as it passed the House?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. It represents the bill as amended.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. As I remember, we got into a discussion over the language on page 2, lines 3 and 4:

Propaganda instigated from foreign sources or who, while in the United States, engages in unlawful political activities.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is right.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Did we not define "political activity"?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. My good colleague the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS], for whom I have the highest regard, was a member of this Committee on Un-American Activities; and he and I and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], the chairman of that committee, and the other members of the committee, unanimously endorsed that provision in our report to this House in 1935. In that report we made this recommendation. Upon this recommendation I, as chairman of the Committee on Immigration, followed out the report of the Committee on Un-American Activities by having a hearing; and we used in our bill the identical language used in the report of the Committee on Un-American Activities. The gentleman from Ohio signed that report.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I am not so sure about all that. What I want to know is whether the bill at any place defines "political activities." I notice there is a definition of unlawful propaganda appearing on page 2, line 12.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. There is not a definition of "political activity." I think the gentleman from Ohio will recall that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR], the gentleman from Ohio himself, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], and I discussed this very question and finally struck the language of the law. Personally I do not feel it ought to be amended. We discussed it on the floor of the House last year when we passed it. There was full and fair discussion. I feel that it is for the best interests of this country that we rid it of those people who come here for no good or lawful purpose, or for no purpose other than to spread propaganda inimical to our form of government and to our institutions.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. This bill does define political activity on page 3.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I have not the bill before me.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Here is what is stated, and this justifies my raising the question, because we did have a lot of discussion about this matter:

> Any activities, identified with official policies of any foreign governmental agency or political party, which are directed or supported from a headquarters located in territory outside the jurisdiction of the United States and which seek to influence political action and thought, within the United States.

That defines it. I was very much perturbed about the general wording, which included "unlawful political activities", because if we are going to send people out of the country for unlawful political activities, after awhile we will have more to send out than we can provide sailing facilities for.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. This measure has the support not only of the Committee on Un-American Activities but it has the unanimous support of the Committee on Immigration?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes. This bill has the support of every organization that appeared before our committee.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Does not the gentleman from New York consider this is a very important measure and somewhat of a departure from the historic policy of our country with regard to its immigration laws?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I may say to the gentleman the Committee on Immigration, the Committee on Un-American Activities, the majority of the membership of this House, as well as the Department of Labor and all departments that have been called in, feel it is a most vital piece of legislation for the protection of Americans. This does not interfere with our people. Let us take a specific case. A man applies to an American consul for permission to visit this country. He has no more business visiting this country than I have visiting Germany. He comes here for the sole purpose of trying to promote another loan from this Government. He comes here for the sole purpose of promoting a little war between one form of government and another form of government. He comes here for the sole purpose of stirring up hate between various people in this country. We have no method under the present law to tell that gentleman to go back home and promote his propaganda work over there.

Mr. EBERHARTER. May I ask the gentleman from New York whether or not he does not consider this enough of a departure from our historic policy with regard to immigration that the matter should be debated and come up on Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. We had it up for consideration on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Is it on that calendar this year?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. This was unanimously passed by the last Congress after a full and fair discussion. The gentleman will understand I am trying to do my duty, and I know he is. If he wants to do something for his country as a Member of this House, please do not object to this bill.

Mr. MCCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MCCORMACK. The gentleman is perfectly justified in making his inquiries, but I think he is disturbed on a point which I might be able to clarify in his mind.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Will the gentleman answer this question? Does he not think in many respects this bill is a restriction of free speech?

Mr. MCCORMACK. No.

Mr. EBERHARTER. A restriction of free speech on the part of persons who may be in this country with very good intentions?

Mr. MCCORMACK. No.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I think the gentleman will find that is true if he will read the bill closely. It says any person who advocates on behalf of any political party——

Mr. MCCORMACK. The word "unlawful" is used in there, and that is defined.

The regular order was demanded.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ADMISSION OF CERTAIN ALIEN WIVES OF UNITED STATES CITIZENS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3471, to permit alien wives of American citizens who married prior to the Immigration Act of 1924 to enter the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the Members of the House ought to be posted on what they are doing today in connection with this bill. If the gentleman, the author of this bill, will explain his bill, I will permit him to do it in my time.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Hawaii.

Mr. KING. The text of this bill is identical with a bill that passed the House last session, which bill was referred to a Senate committee, but not reported by that committee. The purpose is to grant the same exemptions, under existing law, to alien wives of American citizens that are now granted in the case of Chinese wives of American citizens. The total number affected by this bill is about 25, some of whom are residents of my district. The exemption only applies to marriages that occurred prior to the passage of the immigration law of 1924. It would not apply to any marriages subsequent to that time. The present law bans alien wives of American citizens who were married even prior to the passage of the law of 1924, but at a later time an amendment was adopted by the Congress granting exemption to alien wives of the Chinese race, but not to others.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. May I say this bill represents a growth in legislation. In other words, before 1924, the law provided that no alien ineligible for citizenship shall be permitted to come to the United States. That meant people that were not ineligible. There are certain groups of people that cannot come to this country at all. They are racially ineligible. In 1930, as I understand, the law was changed to permit the Chinese wives of American citizens to come in.

Now you come along and again add to that provision and you strike out the provision about the Chinese wife and insert "or is the alien wife of an American citizen who was married prior to the approval of the Immigration Act of 1924." This means that any American citizen, regardless of how ineligible his wife may be, can bring her into this country if they were married before 1924.

Mr. KING. Yes; for two reasons. One is that it was a punishment of American citizens who had married wives who were ineligible for naturalization under the law as it was passed, and the other reason is that the law has already granted exemption to the Chinese but not to other races that are ineligible.

I may say that I would not favor such legislation if it affected a large number, but I have had an estimate made by the Bureau of Immigration and I am informed there are about 25 persons affected by this proposed legislation, and it is pinned down to those married before the passage of the Immigration Act of 1924.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The Members will appreciate that we went a long way when we let down the bars in that act, and as I understand, the gentleman now states there are only about 25 affected.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Who are they?

Mr. KING. Some are Japanese, some are Koreans, some are Annamites, and some are Filipinos.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I take it this must affect some one in the Hawaiian Territory, otherwise the gentleman would not be so interested. What classes of people are affected there?

Mr. KING. There are about five of them. I think there are two Japanese, two Filipinos, and I have forgotten the race of the other.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Of course, this is narrowed by the fact it applies only to those who were married before 1924. I do not want to be captious about it and object on that score, but would the gentleman object to waiting until the next time the calendar is reached and then bring us information from the Department of Labor telling us how many would be affected?

Mr. KING. May I say to the gentleman that last year when he objected, I obtained the information, and the gentleman did not object when it passed the House.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Perhaps I have learned something as I have gone along.

Mr. KING. What I did last year I shall have to do over again. There is one point I would like to call the gentleman's attention to again. There is a certain amount of injustice involved in making the law ex post facto to those American citizens who may have married such wives prior to 1924.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The year 1924 was a great year for the passage of immigration laws, and we have been amending legislation based on those 1924 acts ever since. The gentleman is now opening the door, but if there are only 25 involved, perhaps we ought not to say anything about it.

Mr. KING. It applies only to those married before that year.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Of course, the gentleman will appreciate that it applies to any such American citizen who was married before 1924. Of course, the gentleman says there are only 25 cases, but the language is very broad. However, if no one objects but myself, I shall withdraw my objection, but I wanted the House to know about the situation.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there has been so much fraudulent violation of the immigration laws of 1924 that I am always skeptical of changing those laws at all. If there is any injustice done to these particular individuals, I think it ought to be taken up under special bills, or private bills, for these individuals, because, in my honest opinion, if you pass this law, while you are trying to take care of a very few people, you are going to throw the bars down for more fraudulent immigration into this country, such as we have had since 1924.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Of course, they could open the door by saying that they were married before this time and a lot of things of that sort, although I do not know that would happen.

Mr. RANKIN. I do not know; but every kind of fraud on earth has been perpetrated, it seems to me, to bring people into this country in violation of our immigration laws. I am not saying this with reference to the distinguished gentleman from Hawaii [Mr. KING]. He has not been a party to it, but I do know, and Members of this House know generally that the immigration laws of 1924 have been overridden, they have been violated, they have been disregarded, and hordes of people have come in that were excluded by the law and who could not have come in if the law had been enforced. I am afraid if you make this a blanket proposition you are going to leave another loophole for a number of undesirables to come to this country that we do not want and that we have been trying to keep out since 1924. I think the gentleman ought to introduce private bills for each one of these cases and let them come before the House and have each one considered on its merits.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. When we bring out a private bill, as we did bring out a few, the gentleman objects to them.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; some of them, no doubt.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. So you are damned if you do, and damned if you do not.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; and I may say to the gentleman from New York that I have never regarded him as being in favor of enforcing the immigration laws of this country, and if the bills come from him the chances are that I will be compelled to object to them.

I am going to have to object to this bill at this time.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

SALARIES OF RURAL LETTER CARRIERS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 3609) to protect the salaries of rural letter carriers who transfer from one rural route to another.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. There are five bills on the Consent Calendar from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, nos. 10, 13, 55, 56, and 57. Some of them are very important, and I notice by reference to the calendar that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads is the first committee to be called on Calendar Wednesday. If there is no disposition upon the part of the leadership to dispense with Calendar Wednesday this week, I wonder if it would not be more in keeping with our policy of having full discussion of these bills to take them up on Calendar Wednesday than now by unanimous consent?

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, that will be agreeable to me, with the exception of one or two of these bills, which are not rated as major bills, and which have been passed by the House at a previous session. For example, take Calendar No. 57, which pertains to mail matter for the blind. That ought not to require any discussion, and I doubt whether there would be any objection to it. If we can get through with some of these minor bills today, it means that another committee will have more time on Calendar Wednesday after we conclude our work.

Mr. WOLCOTT. There is a desire to discuss some of these bills, and to be consistent I really think they all should go over to Calendar Wednesday, and let them be considered at that time. I do not think there is any particular objection to the bills on this side, although some of them might need some discussion. In fact, the bill to which reference has been made, no. 57, I am rather anxious to have passed.

Mr. MEAD. I wish the gentleman would allow the bills to come up in order, and if they are not objected to it will mean less work for our committee on Calendar Wednesday and a better opportunity for the committee that follows us. Further, I do not know whether we will have Calendar Wednesday this week.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Are there other bills from the gentleman's committee that he expects to consider on Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. MEAD. One more, possibly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. And is it, in the gentleman's opinion, of more importance than these bills?

Mr. MEAD. I would not say so. Most of these bills have already been passed by the House in the previous Congress. They come to you with the unanimous report of our committee. I would not say that they are major bills. The bill we are now discussing is merely to correct a decision by the Comptroller General. It has been recommended by the Post Office Department, approved unanimously by our committee, and a similar bill was adopted without a dissenting vote in the last session of Congress. It is absolutely fair.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, there is some question as to whether no. 13 on the calendar is not an attempt to blanket the special-delivery messengers into the civil service after all of them have been replaced by patronage appointees. I think that should be discussed. The gentleman last year explained the bill to my satisfaction, and I have no particular objection to the bill at this time, but I know that other Members have some objection to the bill.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Michigan has no objection to special-delivery messengers becoming civil-service employees, has he?

Mr. WOLCOTT. No. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] satisfactorily explained that to me last year. In fact, I have no objection to any of these post-office bills. I know there are objections to them by other Members and I wondered if it would not expedite matters to bring them up on calendar Wednesday and discuss them at that time.

Mr. MEAD. We have the bill now before the House, and because of the uncertainty of having calendar Wednesday this week I would like to have the gentleman allow us to proceed with the consideration of these bills. If they are objected to for the first time they will be called up on another consent day, at which time they will require additional objections, and we shall have made some headway.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that no. 10 on the calendar be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PROMOTION OF SPECIAL-DELIVERY MESSENGERS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 2006) to permit certain special-delivery messengers to acquire a classified status through noncompetitive examination.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, to ask the gentleman whether this bill will be open to amendment and whether he would accept an amendment?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I have the floor and I have not yielded to the gentleman from New York. I object to his remarks being squirted into my discourse. I am asking a question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] whether he would accept an amendment or whether it is in order to make the special-delivery messengers subject to the civil-service laws while remaining right where they are now. I have in mind the provisions of my bill [H. R. 2280], which would place all special-delivery messengers under civil service, under certain circumstances.

Mr. MEAD. I will say to the gentleman that legislation of that character is being considered by the House Committee on the Civil Service. This bill is brought before you by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in order to reward a small number of special-delivery messengers whose services have been highly meritorious.

The members of the Democratic and Republican Parties who are associated with me on that committee eliminated all possibility of favoritism and politics from this bill when they decided that only special-delivery messengers who had been in the Service for 5 years or more would come within the provisions of this bill. Therefore the original appointments would have been made under Republican administration.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

Mr. MEAD. I trust the gentleman will withhold that for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. Is there objection?

Mr. TABER, Mr. McLEAN, and Mr. HOLMES objected.

TO EXCLUDE HABITUAL ALIEN COMMUTERS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3679, to restrict habitual commuting of aliens from foreign contiguous territory to engage in skilled or unskilled labor or employment in continental United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PLUMLEY, Mr. HOLMES, and Mr. COSTELLO objected.

APPEARANCE BY ATTORNEY GENERAL IN CERTAIN CASES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2260, to provide for appearance on behalf of and appeal by the United States in certain cases in which the constitutionality of acts of Congress is involved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

TO AMEND SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION

The Clerk called the next business, House Joint Resolution 137, to amend a Senate joint resolution dated March 28, 1918 (40 Stat. 499).

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this resolution be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INCREASED SALARIES FOR VILLAGE LETTER CARRIERS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4285, to increase the salaries of letter carriers in the Village Delivery Service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice. It should go to Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. TABER. Yes; I will reserve the objection.

Mr. MEAD. I do not believe the gentleman from New York or any other Member objects to a very small increase in salary for these village letter carriers who are now getting as low as $1,150 a year. The gentleman's committee brought in a bill only a week ago with an item in it increasing the salaries of similar positions in the Postal Service.

Mr. TABER. No; not similar.

Mr. MEAD. These men are delivery letter carriers. They work from morning to night in that Service. Those who deliver in the city service receive $2,100. These men in the villages receive as low as $1,150, and cannot go above $1,350. We are trying to give them an increase of $150 in their respective grades. I do not believe there is a Member of this House who would object to this meager increase for these employees of the Postal Service. They are the lowest paid carriers we have. The gentleman has a number of them in his own district and knows how hard they work.

Mr. VOORHIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. VOORHIS. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] whether it is not true that in many cases these village carriers work longer hours and a great deal harder than anyone else in the Postal Service?

Mr. MEAD. They do work long hours. They work for the very smallest pay given anyone in the carrier service.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

EQUIPMENT ALLOWANCE TO THIRD-CLASS POSTMASTERS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2723, granting equipment allowance to third-class postmasters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

SPECIAL RATES OF POSTAGE ON MATTER FOR THE BLIND

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4286, to provide special rates of postage on matter for the blind.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That magazines, periodicals, and other regularly issued publications in raised characters, whether prepared by hand or printed, or on sound-reproduction records (for the use of the blind), which contain no advertisements, when furnished by an organization, institution, or association not conducted for private profit, to a blind person, at a price not greater than the cost price thereof, shall be transmitted in the United States mails at the postage rate of 1 cent for each pound or fraction thereof, under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ACQUISITION OF LANDS AT ALAMEDA, CALIF., FOR NAVAL AIR STATION

The Clerk called the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 43) to amend Public Law No. 780, Seventy-fourth Congress, authorizing the acquisition of lands in the city of Alameda, county of Alameda, State of California, as a site for a naval air station, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That section 1 of Public Law No. 780, entitled "An act to authorize the acquisition of lands in the city of Alameda, county of Alameda, State of California, as a site for a naval air station, and to authorize the construction and installation of a naval air station thereon", approved June 24, 1936, is amended by inserting after the words "free from all", before the colon and preceding the proviso, the word "encumbrances."

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title of the joint resolution was amended to read: "Joint resolution to amend Public Law No. 780, Seventy-fourth Congress, to authorize the acquisition of lands in the city of Alameda, county of Alameda, State of California, as a site for a naval air station, and to authorize the construction and installation of a naval air station thereon, for the purpose of making a correction therein."

OFFICE OF NAVAL RECORDS AND LIBRARY, NAVY DEPARTMENT

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3598, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to accept gifts and bequests for the benefit of the Office of Naval Records and Library, Navy Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute Senate bill 1128 for the House bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the Senate bill identical with the House bill?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. It is identical.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to accept, receive, hold, and administer gifts and bequests of personal property, and loans of personal property other than money, from individuals or others for the benefit of the Office of Naval Records and Library, Navy Department, its collection or its services. Gifts or bequests of money shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as trust funds under the title "Office of Naval Records and Library Fund."

SEC. 2. Gifts or bequests for the benefit of the Office of Naval Records and Library, Navy Department, its collection or its services shall be exempt from all Federal taxes.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, upon the request of the Secretary of the Navy, to invest or reinvest the trust funds, or any part thereof, deposited in the Treasury pursuant to section 1 of this act in securities of the United States Government or in securities guaranteed by the United States Government. The interest accruing from such securities shall be deposited to the credit of the Office of Naval Records and Library Fund.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider and a similar House bill (H. R. 3598) were laid on the table.

ACCEPTANCE OF CERTAIN LANDS AT SAN DIEGO, CALIF.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3607, to authorize the acceptance of certain lands in the city of San Diego, Calif., by the United States and the transfer by the Secretary of the Navy of certain other lands to said city of San Diego.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent, a similar Senate bill, S. 1130, was substituted in lieu of the House bill.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized on behalf of the United States to accept from the city of San Diego, California, free from all encumbrances and without cost to the United States, all right, title, and interest in and to the lands contained within the following-described area: Beginning at the intersection of the southeasterly line of Harasthy Street with mean high-tide line of the Bay of San Diego, as said mean high-tide line was established by that certain superior court action no. 35473; thence southwesterly along the southwesterly prolongation of the southeasterly line of Harasthy Street a distance of 159.66 feet to an intersection with the northeasterly Marine Base boundary line; thence north 60°34'59" west along the said Marine Base boundary line a distance of 1,929.11 feet to its intersection with the said mean high-tide line of the Bay of San Diego; thence in a general southeasterly direction, following along the said mean high-tide line to the point or place of beginning, containing 5.2474 acres of land; also approximately 544 acres of pueblo lands, owned by the city of San Diego, more particularly described as follows: The easterly half of pueblo lot 1300; all of pueblo lot 1309; all of pueblo lot 1310; all of that portion of pueblo lot 1311 lying easterly of Pacific Highway and southerly of Miramar Road; all of that portion of pueblo lot 1314 lying southerly of Miramar Road; all of that portion of pueblo lot 1315 lying southerly of Miramar Road; all of that portion of the westerly half of pueblo lot 1316 lying southerly of Miramar Road; said pueblo lands being according to the map thereof made by James Pascoe in 1870, a certified copy of which map is filed as miscellaneous map no. 36 in the office of the county recorder of San Diego County, Calif.; said lands being desired by the Navy Department for national defense, and particularly for the purpose of establishing and maintaining thereon a rifle range, together with barracks and other structures incident thereto.

The said Secretary of the Navy is also authorized hereby to transfer to the city of San Diego, California, free from all encumbrances and without cost to said city of San Diego, all rights, title, and interest of the United States in and to the lands contained within that part of the Marine Corps Base, San Diego, Calif., containing 60.1605 acres, more particularly described as follows: Beginning at the point of intersection of the southwesterly prolongation of the northwesterly line of Bean Street with the combined United States pierhead and bulkhead line, as said combined United States pierhead and bulkhead line was established in 1928; thence north 83° west a distance of 729.62 feet along the said combined pierhead and bulkhead line to an intersection with the southwesterly prolongation of the southeasterly line of Harasthy Street; thence north 28°49'40" east along the southwesterly prolongation of the southeasterly line of Harasthy Street, a distance of 4,008.27 feet to an intersection with the existing Marine Base boundary line; thence south 60°34'59" east along the said Marine Base boundary line a distance of 677.88 feet to an intersection with the southwesterly prolongation of the northwesterly line of Bean Street; thence south 28°50'10" west along the southwesterly prolongation of the northwesterly line of Bean Street a distance of 3,730.02 feet to the point or place of beginning, containing 60.1605 acres of bay area.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider and a similar House bill (H. R. 3607) were laid on the table.

FOURCHE LA FAVE RIVER, ARK.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 61, authorizing a preliminary examination of the Fourche La Fave River, in Perry, Yell, and Scott Counties, Ark., with a view to the control of its floods.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice a number of similar bills on the calendar, nos. 63, 64, 65—about seven or eight of them—all to the same purport. Those of us who live along rivers, especially along the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, where there has been a disastrous flood, are keenly alive to flood-control measures, and we know that a movement is on foot for a national flood-control policy. I see some of these bills have been reported by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON], chairman of the Committee on Flood Control. I do not want to say that these are unnecessary, but if we are going to start out with surveys of every little river in the country, spending $3,000, $4,000, or $5,000 on each, we will soon spend our money without touching the real problem to be solved.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. These survey bills have been passed each year by the dozen, as the gentleman knows. They do not, as the gentleman knows, involve the expenditure of additional money, for the Army engineers make the surveys with their regular equipment. It merely keeps the Army busy. We have passed similar bills here from time immemorial. We must have passed 50 or 60 last year.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes; but the gentleman was not here in years gone by when two or three of us stood up here and stopped bills of this kind. We held them up until a policy was developed. I am not sure that we did the wise thing in withdrawing our opposition, for this flood of bills that the gentleman speaks of is the result.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. They are merely reports.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The gentleman says they will not cost anything. He is sadly mistaken in that respect. Each and every one of these surveys will cost from one thousand to maybe fifty thousand dollars.

In view of all the facts and circumstances, especially in view of the endeavor to lay out a national flood-control program, I hope objection will not be raised if, as these bills are reached, I ask that they be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. TERRY. This is my bill. This is a small river, but it floods four or five times a season and people in its valley have lost crops year after year on this account. The Army engineers have a large fund that is set aside especially for small preliminary examinations.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. But the gentleman does not say that the Army engineers have said that they want to make this survey. I know how difficult it has been in times gone by to get them to make surveys, because they are so busy. They object to making them because they have so much to do and so little money with which to do it.

Mr. TERRY. But the Army engineers have not objected to making this survey.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. No; for they have never been asked to make it.

Mr. TERRY. This bill would call it to their attention. No objection has been made to it by them so far. This is the usual and common thing.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. It would not mean a lot to the gentleman to let this go over for 2 weeks? I do not want to object to this one. I want them all passed over.

Mr. TERRY. The gentleman should not object. The fact there are three or four more will not keep the Army engineers from making surveys in the part of the country in which the gentleman is interested. We are not going to offer any objection to what the Government will do for his part of the country and we hope he will not make an objection to the small thing we are asking here.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Is the gentleman a member of the Flood Control Committee?

Mr. TERRY. No; but I am very much interested in the matter.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am a member of the Flood Control Committee.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. What is the policy of that committee in reference to these matters?

Mr. McCLELLAN. It is the policy of that committee to recommend that these surveys be made. We are undertaking and the Congress is undertaking and the Nation is interested in bringing about the enactment of a flood-control program that will solve our problems. I do not know any better way to do it than to report these bills, pass them, and give the Army engineers and the War Department authority to make these surveys in order to secure the information.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. During the past week I attended a meeting out in the Ohio Valley, which was also attended by many Army engineers. There were about 500 or 600 people there from all along the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. Every Army engineer who made a speech said they could not take care of these major projects because they did not have the money. If we are going to deplete their money by having it spent for a lot of little things like this, they will not be able to go ahead. Whenever a bill of this kind is passed they take that to mean it is an order to go ahead and spend some more money.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Does not the gentleman believe, and is it not a known fact, the only way to treat the major streams is through making these surveys?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The Army has made many surveys and has all those rivers blue printed. They have enough blue prints drawn now to take more money than we have appropriated for them to go ahead. They could start within a week and go ahead with nearly $200,000,000 worth of work if they had the money. Now you are loading them down with more charges.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have a bill here in which I am interested, and I do not believe he understands what it means. I know definitely that the Army engineers have asked that the particular bill I have introduced be passed.

Mr. Speaker, may I say that the bill I have introduced, and which has been reported out of the committee, provides for a survey of the Snake River. The Army maintains a large organization out in the West which is making surveys on the Columbia River. This is to cure a defect in a bill authorizing the survey of the Columbia River and will give the Army engineers the authority to do any work on the Snake River, which is one of the great rivers of the country, without this authority the work is being held up.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I hope the gentleman will not object to these bills and ask that they go over for the reason they have been before the committee and have been favorably reported. The Army engineers have given their approval. They have been presented to the department, and under those circumstances it is customary to favorably report them to the House.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact so many fine Members have implored me not to object, I will not object, and I withdraw my unanimous consent request that this bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination to be made of the Fourche La Fave River, in Perry, Yell, and Scott Counties, Ark., with a view to the control of its floods, in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the control of the floods of the Mississippi River, and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes", approved March 1, 1917, the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 7, strike out "section 3 of an act entitled 'An act to provide for the control of the floods of the Mississippi River, and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes', approved March 1, 1917" and insert in lieu thereof "the Flood Control Act approved June 22, 1936."

Page 2, line 3, after the word "for", strike out "examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors" and insert in lieu thereof "such purposes."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended to read as follows: "A bill authorizing a preliminary examination and survey of the Fourche La Fave River, in Perry, Yell, and Scott Counties, Ark., with a view to the control of its floods."

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION AND SURVEY OF THE SNAKE RIVER AND TRIBUTARIES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 201, to provide a preliminary examination and survey of the Snake River and tributaries in the States of Idaho, Washington, and Oregon, with a view to control of floodwaters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a similar Senate bill, S. 206, be submitted for the House bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination and survey to be made of the Snake River and tributaries in the States of Idaho, Washington, and Oregon with a view to control of its floods, in accordance with the provisions of the Flood Control Act approved June 22, 1936, the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for such purposes.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill, H. R. 201, was laid on the table.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF THE BATTENKILL IN NEW YORK

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2682, to authorize a preliminary examination of the Battenkill, in New York, with a view to the control of its floods.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination to be made of the Battenkill, in the State of New York, with a view to the control of its floods, in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the control of the floods of the Mississippi River and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes", approved March 1, 1917, the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "of", strike out "section 3 of the act entitled 'An act to provide for the control of the floods of the Mississippi River and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes', approved March 1, 1917" and insert the words "the Flood Control Act approved June 22, 1936."

Page 2, line 2, after the word "for", strike out the words "examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors" and insert the words "such purposes."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended to read: "A bill to authorize a preliminary examination and survey of the Battenkill, in New York, with a view to the control of its floods."

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF THE METTAWEE RIVER IN NEW YORK

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2683, to authorize a preliminary examination of the Mettawee River, in New York, with a view to the control of its floods.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination to be made of the Mettawee River, in the State of New York, with a view to the control of its floods, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the control of the floods of the Mississippi River and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes", approved March 1, 1917, the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "examination", insert the words "and survey."

Page 1, line 7, after the word "the", strike out the remainder of the line, all of lines 8, 9, and 10, and insert "Flood Control Act approved June 22, 1936."

Page 2, line 2, after the word "for", strike out the remainder of line 2 and all of line 3 and insert "such purposes."

Amend the title.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended to read: "A bill to authorize a preliminary examination and survey of the Mettawee River in New York with a view to the control of its floods."

VENTURA RIVER, CALIF.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3305, to authorize a preliminary examination and survey of the Ventura River, in Ventura County, State of California, with a view to the control of its floods.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 6 of the act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of certain public works on rivers and harbors for flood control, and for other purposes", approved June 22, 1936, is hereby amended by striking out "Ventura Harbor, Calif.", and inserting in lieu thereof "Ventura River, Calif."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SANTA MARIA RIVER, CALIF.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3306, to authorize a preliminary examination and survey of Santa Maria River, with a view to the control of its floods.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination and survey to be made of the Santa Maria River and its tributaries, in the State of California, with a view to the control of its floods.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "floods", insert "in accordance with the provisions of the Flood Control Act approved June 22, 1936, the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for such purposes."

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, the House has just passed the bill H. R. 3304 and is now considering the bill H. R. 3306, two companion bills sponsored and introduced by our lamented and departed friend, HENRY E. STUBBS, of California.

I just wanted to take this opportunity to pay briefly my respects to this honored colleague of ours who, on yesterday, passed into the great beyond. It is only fitting and appropriate that these bills should be considered and passed without hearing from this distinguished colleague because it is typical and emblematic of his tenure here in the House. Quiet, unobtrusive, kindly, never colorful, and never seeking the public light, he went about representing the best interests of his district and of his country.

I am only too glad, as just one humble Member of this body, who numbered him among my friends, to have this opportunity to pay this flower of tribute to his memory.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SURVEY OF LAVACA RIVER, TEX.

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 3619) authorizing a preliminary examination and survey of Lavaca River, Tex., with a view to control of its floods.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination and survey to be made of Lavaca River, Tex., with a view to the control of its floods, in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of an act entitled "An act to provide for control of the floods of the Mississippi River, and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes", approved March 1, 1917.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 6, strike out the word "section" and lines 7, 8, and 9, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "the Flood Control Act approved June 22, 1936, the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for such purposes."

The committee amendment was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SURVEY OF MILL CREEK, AUSTIN COUNTY, TEX.

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 3620) authorizing a preliminary examination and survey of Mill Creek, a tributary of the Brazos River, in Austin County, Tex., with a view to the control of its floods.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination and survey to be made of Mill Creek, a tributary of the Brazos River, in Austin County, Tex., with a view to the control of its floods, in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of an act entitled "An act to provide for control of the floods of the Mississippi River, and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes", approved March 1, 1917.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 7, strike out "section 3 of an" and all of lines 8, 9, and 10 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "the Flood Control Act approved June 22, 1936, the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for such purposes."

The committee amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SURVEY OF NAVIDAD RIVER, TEX.

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 3621) authorizing a preliminary examination and survey of the Navidad River, Tex., with a view to the control of its floods.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination and survey to be made of Navidad River, Tex., with a view to the control of its floods, in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of an act entitled "An act to provide for control of the floods of the Mississippi River, and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes", approved March 1, 1917.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all of lines 7, 8, 9, and 10 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "the Flood Control Act approved June 22, 1936, the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for such purposes."

The committee amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FREE HIGHWAY BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER, ATCHISON, KANS.

The Clerk called the bill (S. 62) to extend the times for commencing and completing construction of a free highway bridge across the Missouri River at or near Atchison, Kans.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes.

Mr. DUNCAN. This is simply for the renewal of franchises already granted. The contract has been awarded by the highway commissions of Kansas and Missouri for the construction of the bridge and a great deal of money has been expended on the Missouri side. What objection can there be to a renewal?

Mr. HOUSTON. Has all the money been appropriated for this structure?

Mr. DUNCAN. That is my understanding.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes.

Mr. HOPE. I trust the gentleman will not pursue his request. This is merely an extension of time for the construction of this bridge. Contracts have been let. It is a free highway bridge. The bridge would have been constructed before this had it not been for the obstructive tactics of the owners of the toll bridge in the same location. The toll bridge is inadequate to carry the traffic. This bridge is a much-needed improvement. It is possible, of course, to go ahead at the present time with the construction, but it cannot be completed by the time the present authorization would expire. I trust the gentleman will not persist in his request.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not objecting. I am asking that it be put over without prejudice. I have heard rumors that it deprives all of the districts in Kansas of any money for highways if this bill goes through.

Mr. HOPE. I think the gentleman is in error. If there is any objection that could be made, it could be made only from the highway district in which the bridge is located. It will not make any difference in the highway district from which the gentleman comes, or in the highway district which I represent because, as I understand it, highway funds are apportioned approximately equally among the six highway districts in the State, and this can only affect other highway projects in the district in which the bridge is located.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman is correct in his assertions that it will affect only the district in which the bridge is located, I shall withdraw my request.

Mr. HOPE. I am quite positive it will not affect highway allocations in any other district than the first.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of the free highway bridge, and approaches thereto, across the Missouri River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the city of Atchison, Kans., authorized to be built by the city of Atchison, Kans., and the county of Buchanan, Mo., or either of them, or the States of Kansas and Missouri, or either of them, or the highway departments of such States, acting jointly or severally, by an act of Congress approved June 18, 1934, are hereby extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from June 18, 1937.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, the next two bills on the calendar have not been on for the necessary 3 legislative days. This, therefore, concludes the consideration of the calendar today.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA LEGISLATION

The SPEAKER. Under previous order, the Committee on the District of Columbia is entitled to the call. The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

JUVENILE COURT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4276) to amend an act entitled "An act to create a juvenile court in and for the District of Columbia", and for other purposes; and pending that, I move that general debate on the bill do now close and that the bill be read under the 5-minute rule.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentlewoman from New Jersey that general debate on the bill do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentlewoman from New Jersey that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4276.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4276) to amend an act entitled "An act to create a juvenile court in and for the District of Columbia", and for other purposes, with Mr. O'CONNOR of New York in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act to create a juvenile court in and for the District of Columbia", approved March 19, 1906, as amended, is, with the exception of section 1 of said act, hereby further amended so as to read as follows:

"Purpose and basic principle: The purpose of this act is to secure for each child under its jurisdiction such care and guidance, preferably in his own home, as will serve the child's welfare and the best interests of the State; to conserve and strengthen the child's family ties whenever possible, removing him from the custody of his parents only when his welfare or the safety and protection of the public cannot be adequately safeguarded without such removal; and, when such child is removed from his own family, to secure for him custody, care, and discipline as nearly as possible equivalent to that which should have been given by his parents.

"The principle is hereby recognized that children under the jurisdiction of the court are subject to the discipline and entitled to the protection of the State, which may intervene to safeguard them from neglect or injury and to enforce the legal obligations due to them and from them.

"SEC. 2. Construction of the act: This act shall be liberally construed to accomplish the purpose herein sought.

"SEC. 3. A court of records; seal; oaths: Said court shall be a court of record. The court shall have a seal, and the judge or acting judge thereof shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations.

"SEC. 4. Terms: The said court shall hold a term on the first Monday of every month and continue the same from day to day as long as it may be necessary for the transaction of its business.

"SEC. 5. Application of act and definitions:

"(a) This act shall apply to any person under the age of 18 years—

"(1) Who has violated any law; or who has violated any ordinance or regulation of the District of Columbia; or

"(2) Who is habitually beyond the control of his parent, custodian, or guardian; or

"(3) Who is habitually truant from school or home; or

"(4) Who habitually so deports himself as to injure or endanger himself or the morals or safety of himself or others; or

"(5) Who is abandoned by his parent, guardian, or custodian; or

"(6) Who is homeless or without adequate parental support or care, or whose parent, guardian, or custodian neglects or refuses to provide support and care necessary for his health or welfare; or

"(7) Whose parent, guardian, or custodian neglects or refuses to provide or avail himself of the special care made necessary by his mental condition; or

"(8) Who associates with vagrants, vicious, or immoral persons; or

"(9) Who engages in an occupation or is in a situation dangerous to life or limb or injurious to the health or morals of himself or others; or

"(b) When used in this act—

"(1) The words 'the court' means the juvenile court of the District of Columbia;

"(2) The word 'judge' means the judge of the juvenile court;

"(3) The word 'child' means a person under the age of 18 years;

"(4) The word 'adult' means a person 18 years of age or older.

"SEC. 6. Jurisdiction.—1. Children: Except as herein otherwise provided, the court shall have original and exclusive jurisdiction of all cases and in proceedings:

"(a) Concerning any child coming within the terms and provisions of this act.

"(b) Concerning any person under 21 years of age charged with having violated any law, or violated any ordinance or regulation of the District of Columbia, prior to having become 18 years of age.

"(c) To determine the paternity of any child alleged to have been born out of wedlock and to provide for his support in accordance with the provisions of an act providing for the support and maintenance of children born out of wedlock, approved June 18, 1912 (D. C. Code, title 18, secs. 281–287); in which cases the respondent shall be entitled to jury trial if he shall so demand.

"(d) To determine the custody or guardianship of the person of any child coming within the provisions of this act.

"Nothing contained herein shall deprive other courts of the right to determine the custody of children upon writs of habeas corpus, or when such custody is incidental to the determination of causes pending in such courts.

"When jurisdiction shall have been obtained by the court in the case of any child, such child shall continue under the jurisdiction of the court until he becomes 21 years of age unless discharged prior thereto: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall affect the jurisdiction of other courts over offenses committed by such child after he reaches the age of 18.

"2. Adults: The court shall have original and exclusive jurisdiction to determine cases of adults charged with willfully contributing to, encouraging, or tending to cause by any act or omission any condition which would bring a child within the provisions of this act.

"The court shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia in all cases involving children arising under the act entitled 'An act making it a misdemeanor in the District of Columbia to abandon or willfully neglect to provide for the support and maintenance by any person of his wife or of his or her minor children in destitute or necessitous circumstances', approved March 23, 1906 (D. C. Code, title 6, secs. 270–273).

"SEC. 7. Information; investigation; petition: Any person may give to a duly designated officer of the court information in his possession that a child is within the provisions of this act. Thereupon such officer may make preliminary inquiry to determine whether the interests of the public or of the child require that further action be taken. Whenever practicable such inquiry shall include a preliminary investigation of the home and environmental situation of the child, his previous history, and the circumstances which were the subject of the information. If such officer shall determine that formal jurisdiction should be acquired, he shall authorize a petition to be filed. The proceeding shall be entitled 'In the matter of ———, a child under 18 years of age.'

"The petition shall be verified, alleging briefly the facts which bring said child within the provisions of this act, and stating the name, age, and residence (1) of the child; (2) of his parents; (3) of his legal guardian, if there be one; (4) of the person or persons having custody or control of the child; and (5) of the nearest known relative, if no parent or guardian can be found. If any of the facts herein required are not known by the petitioner, the petition shall so state.

"SEC. 8. Summons; notice; custody of the child: After a petition shall have been filed, unless the parties hereinafter named shall voluntarily appear, the court shall issue a summons reciting briefly the substance of the petition, and requiring the person or persons who have the custody or control of the child to appear personally and bring the child before the court at a time and place stated. If the person so summoned shall be other than the parent or guardian of the child, then the parent or guardian or both shall also be notified of the pendency of the case and of the time and place appointed, by personal service before the hearing, except as hereinafter provided: Provided, That if the child is married then the other spouse shall also be so notified. Summons may be issued requiring the appearance of any other person whose presence, in the opinion of the judge, is necessary.

"If it appears that the child is in such condition or surroundings that his welfare requires that his custody be immediately assumed by the court, the judge may cause to be endorsed upon the summons an order that the officer serving the same shall at once take the child into custody.

"SEC. 9. Service of summons: Service of summons shall be made personally by the delivery of a true and attested copy to the person summoned: Provided, That where reasonable but unsuccessful efforts have been made to make personal service of summons or notice and if it shall appear that it is impracticable to do so, the court may make an order providing for service of summons or notice by registered mail to the last known address or by publication, or both, as may be deemed necessary. It shall be sufficient to confer jurisdiction if service is effected at any time before the date fixed in the summons for the return thereof: Provided, That on request of the parent or guardian or person having custody of the child, the hearing on the petition shall not take place until 3 days subsequent to service of said summons.

"The United States marshal for the District of Columbia or his deputy shall execute the orders and processes of the court in the same manner as he executes those of the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, and shall designate at least one of his deputies to serve at the court, where he shall perform such services as are required by the judge.

"SEC. 10. Failure to obey summons; warrant: If any person summoned as herein provided shall, without reasonable cause, fail to appear, he may be proceeded against for contempt of court. In case the summons cannot be served, or the parties served fail to obey the same, or in any case when it shall be made to appear to the judge that the service will be ineffectual or the welfare of the child requires that he shall be brought forthwith into the custody of the court, a warrant may be issued against the parent or guardian or against the child himself.

"SEC. 11. Release of children taken into custody: Whenever any officer takes a child into custody, he shall, unless it is impracticable or has been otherwise ordered by the court, accept the written promise of the parent, guardian, or custodian to bring the child to the court at the time fixed. Thereupon such child may be released in the custody of a parent, guardian, or custodian. If not so released, such child shall be placed in the custody of a probation officer or other person designated by the court, or taken immediately to the court or to a place of detention provided by the Board of Public Welfare, and the officer taking him shall immediately notify the court and shall file a petition when directed to do so by the court.

"In the case of any child whose custody has been assumed by the court and pending the final disposition of the case, the child may be released in the custody of a parent, guardian, or custodian, or of a probation officer or other person appointed by the court, to be brought before the court at the time designated. When not released as herein provided, such child, pending the hearing of the case, shall be detained in such place of detention as shall be provided by the Board of Public Welfare, subject to further order of the court.

"Nothing in this act shall be construed as forbidding any peace officer, police officer, or probation officer from immediately taking into custody any child who is found violating any law or ordinance, or who is reasonably believed to be a fugitive from his parents or from justice, or whose surroundings are such as to endanger his health, morals, or safety, unless immediate action is taken. In every such case the officer taking the child into custody shall immediately report the fact to the court and the case shall then be proceeded with as provided in this act.

"SEC. 12. Transfer from other courts: If during the pendency of a criminal or quasi-criminal charge against any person under 21 years of age, in any other court, it shall be ascertained that such person was under the age of 18 years at the time of committing the alleged offense, it shall be the duty of such court to transfer such other case immediately, together with all the papers, documents, and testimony connected therewith, to the juvenile court. Such other court making such transfer shall order the child to be taken forthwith to the place of detention designated by the court or to that court itself, or release such child in the custody of some suitable person to appear before the juvenile court at a time designated. The court shall thereupon proceed to hear and dispose of such case in the same manner as if it had been instituted in that court in the first instance.

"SEC. 13. Waiver of jurisdiction: If a child 16 years of age or older is charged with an offense which would amount to a felony in the case of an adult, the judge, after full investigation, may waive jurisdiction and order such child held for trial under the regular procedure of the court which would have jurisdiction of such offense if committed by an adult; or such other court may exercise the powers conferred upon the juvenile court in this act in conducting and disposing of such case.

"SEC. 14. Hearing; judgment: The court may conduct the hearing in an informal manner and may adjourn the hearing from time to time. In the hearing of any case the general public shall be excluded and only such persons as have a direct interest in the case and their representatives admitted. All cases involving children may be heard separately and apart from the trial of cases against adults. The court shall hear and determine all cases of children without a jury unless a jury be demanded by the child, his parent, or guardian or the court.

"If the court shall find that the child comes within the provisions of this act, it may by order duly entered proceed as follows:

"(1) Place the child on probation or under supervision in his own home or in the custody of a relative or other fit person, upon such terms as the court shall determine.

"(2) Commit the child to the Board of Public Welfare; or to the National Training School for Girls or the National Training School for Boys if in need of such care as is given in such schools; or to a qualified suitable private institution or agency willing and able to assume the education, care, and maintenance of such child without expense to the public.

"(3) Make such further disposition as the court may deem to be best for the best interests of the child, except as herein otherwise provided.

"Whenever a child is committed by the court to custody other than that of its parent, the court may, after giving the parent a reasonable opportunity to be heard, adjudge that such parent shall pay in such manner as the court may direct such sum as will cover in whole or in part the support of such child, and, if such parent shall willfully fail or refuse to pay such sum, he may be proceeded against as provided by law for cases of desertion or failure to provide subsistence.

"Whenever the court shall commit a child to any institution or agency it shall transmit with the order of commitment a summary of its information concerning such child.

"No adjudication upon the status of any child in the jurisdiction of the court shall operate to impose any of the civil disabilities ordinarily imposed by conviction, nor shall any child be deemed a criminal by reason of such adjudication, nor shall such adjudication be deemed a conviction of a crime, nor shall any child be charged with or convicted of a crime in any court, except as provided in section 13 of this act. The disposition of a child or any evidence given in the court shall not be admissible as evidence against the child in any case or proceeding in any other court, nor shall such disposition, or evidence or adjudication operate to disqualify a child in any future civil-service examination, appointment, or application for public service under either the Government of the United States or of the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 15. Modification of judgment; return of child to parents: An order of commitment or probation made by the court in the case of a child shall be subject to modification or revocation from time to time.

"A parent, guardian, or next friend of a child who has been committed by the court to the custody of an institution, agency, or person, may at any time file with the court a verified petition, making application for modification or revocation of an order of commitment or probation, stating that such institution, agency, or person has denied application for the release of the child or has failed to act upon such application within a reasonable time. If the court is of the opinion that an investigation should be had, it may, upon due notice to all concerned, proceed to hear and determine the question at issue. It may thereupon order that such child be restored to the custody of its parent or guardian or be retained in the custody of the institution, agency, or person; and may direct such institution, agency, or person to make such other arrangements for the child's care and welfare as the circumstances of the case may require; or the court may make a further order or commitment.

"SEC. 16. Appointment of guardian: Whenever in the course of a proceeding instituted under this act it shall appear to the court that the welfare of a child will be promoted by the appointment of a relative or other suitable individual as guardian of its person, when such child is not committed to an institution or to the custody of an incorporated society, the court shall have jurisdiction to make such appointment either upon the application of the child or some relative or next friend or upon the court's own motion, and in that event an order to show cause may be made by the court to be served upon the parent or parents or custodian of said child in such manner and for such time prior to the hearing as the court may deem reasonable. In a case arising under this act the court may also determine as between parents whether the father or the mother shall have the custody and control of said child.

"SEC. 17. Selection of custodial agency: In placing a child under any guardianship or custody other than that of its parent, the court shall, when practicable, select a person, or an institution or agency governed by persons of like religious faith as that of the parents of such child, or in case of a difference in the religious faith of the parents, then of the religious faith of the child, or if the religious faith of the child is not ascertained, then of either of the parents.

"SEC. 18. Procedure in adult cases: All provisions of this act relative to procedure in cases of children so far as practicable shall be construed as applying also to cases against adults arising under section 6 of this act with the consent of the defendant or when not inconsistent with other provisions of law relating to the conduct of adult cases. Proceedings may be instituted upon complaint of an interested party or upon the court's own motion, and a reasonable opportunity to appear shall be afforded the respondent. The court may issue a summons, a warrant of arrest, or other process in order to secure or to compel the attendance of any necessary person. Any person who by act or omission willfully causes, encourages, or contributes to any condition which would bring a child within the provisions of this act, or who by such act or omission tends to cause such a condition, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and punished by a fine not exceeding $200 or imprisoned not exceeding 12 months, or by both fine and imprisonment. Upon the trial of such cases the court shall have power to impose such sentence as the law provides, or may suspend sentence and place on probation, and by order impose upon such adult such duty as shall be deemed to be for the best interests of the child or other persons concerned. If an adult is charged with an offense for which he is entitled to a trial by jury, and if he shall so demand, a jury shall be selected in accordance with the provisions of law regulating the selection of juries in the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 19. Appointment and qualifications of judge: The judge of the court shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate, for a term of 6 years, or until his successor is appointed and confirmed. To be eligible for appointment as judge a person must be a member of the bar, preferably of the District of Columbia, and have a knowledge of social problems and procedure and an understanding of child psychology. The judge shall, before entering upon the duties of his office, take the oath prescribed for judges of courts of the United States. The salary of the judge shall be fixed in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.

"SEC. 20. Filling vacancy in judgeship in cases of sickness, etc.: In cases of sickness, absence, disability, or death of the judge of the juvenile court, the chief justice or acting chief justice of the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia shall designate one of the judges of the municipal court of said District to discharge the duties of said judge of the juvenile court until such disability be removed or vacancy filled.

"SEC. 21. Appointment of director of social work, supervisor of probation, probation officers, and other employees: The judge shall appoint from eligible lists of the Civil Service Commission a director of social work, a supervisor of probation, probation officers, a clerk, a deputy clerk, and such other employees as may be necessary, at such salaries as may be fixed in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and with such qualifications as may be prescribed by the Civil Service Commission pursuant to said act or acts.

"SEC. 22. Duties and powers of the director of social work: Under the administrative direction of the judge, the director of social work shall have charge of all the social work of the court; and shall, in association with other social agencies of the District of Columbia, study sources and causes of delinquency and assist in developing and correlating community-wide plans for the prevention and treatment of delinquency.

"SEC. 23. Duties and powers of the department of probation: The supervisor of probation, under the direction of the director of social work, shall organize, direct, and develop the work of the probation department of the court.

"The probation department of the court shall make such investigations as the court may direct, keep a written record of such investigations, and submit the same to the judge or deal with them as he may direct. The probation department shall use all suitable methods to aid persons on probation and bring about improvement in their conduct and condition; keep informed concerning the conduct and condition of each person under its supervision and report thereon to the judge as he may direct and keep full records of its work. The probation officers shall have such duties as may be assigned to them in the course of performing the functions of the probation department. Probation officers for the purpose of this act shall have the power of police officers.

"SEC. 24. Duties of the clerk: The clerk shall give bond, with surety, and take the oath of office prescribed by law for clerks of district courts of the United States. He shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations; shall keep accurate and complete accounts of money collected from persons under the supervision of the probation department, give receipts therefor, and make reports thereon as the judge may direct; and shall perform such duties and keep such records as may be prescribed by the judge of said court.

"SEC. 25. Appointment of commissioner: The judge of the juvenile court may designate a social worker of the court as commissioner in the first instance to hear any case coming within the provisions of this act and either to dispose thereof or to direct the filing of a petition therein. Whenever a commissioner is appointed in cases of girls, a woman commissioner shall be appointed to hear such cases.

"SEC. 26. Physical and mental examinations and treatment: The court may cause any child coming under its jurisdiction to be examined by a physician, psychiatrist, or psychologist appointed by the court.

"SEC. 27. Place of detention: No child under 18 years of age shall be placed in or committed to any prison, jail, or lock-up, nor shall such child be taken into custody, detained, or transferred from place to place, where he may be brought in contact or communication with any adult convicted of crime or under arrest and charged with crime: Provided, That a child 16 years of age or older, whose habits or conduct are deemed such as to constitute a menace to other children, may, with the consent of the judge or director of social work, be placed in a jail or other place of detention for adults, but in a room or ward separate from adults.

"The Board of Public Welfare of the District of Columbia shall make adequate provision for the temporary detention of children within its jurisdiction in a detention home or in boarding homes selected for purposes of such detention.

"SEC. 28. Court quarters: Suitable quarters shall be provided by the Commissioners for the District of Columbia for the hearing of cases and for the use of the judge and the probation department and employees of the court.

"SEC. 29. Records; forms: The court shall maintain records of all cases brought before it. Such records shall be open to inspection only by order of the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia. The court shall devise and cause to be printed such forms for records and such other papers as may be required.

"SEC. 30. Rules: The court shall have power to issue all necessary orders and writs in aid of the jurisdiction hereby vested in it; and to frame and publish rules and regulate the procedure for cases arising within the provisions of this act and for the conduct of its officers and employees and such rules shall be enforced and construed beneficially for the remedial purposes embraced herein.

"SEC. 31. Cooperation: It is hereby made the duty of every official of the District of Columbia or department thereof to render all assistance and cooperation within his or its jurisdictional power which may further the objects of this act. All institutions or agencies to which the court sends any child are hereby required to give to the court or to any officer appointed by it such information or reports concerning such child as said court or officer may require. The court is authorized to seek the cooperation of all societies or organizations having for their object the protection or aid of children.

"SEC. 32. Cooperation by corporation counsel: The corporation counsel of the District of Columbia or his assistant shall assist the court upon request in hearings to determine delinquency, dependency, or neglect, and shall prosecute all cases within the jurisdiction of the court in which an adult is charged with crime.

"SEC. 33. Contempt: Any person who willfully violates, neglects, or refuses to obey or perform any order of the court may be declared in contempt and be punished by a fine not exceeding $200 or imprisonment for not more than 6 months, or both.

"SEC. 34. Appeal: Any party aggrieved by any final order or judgment of the juvenile court may apply to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia for the allowance of a special appeal, and the said court of appeals may allow such special appeal whenever it is made to appear to said court, upon petition, that it will be in the interest of justice to allow an appeal. The time for, and manner of, taking such special appeal shall be the same as provided by law or rule of court for special appeals in equity cases from the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia to said court of appeals: Provided, That the special appeal or application for the allowance of such special appeal shall not suspend the order of the juvenile court, nor shall it discharge the child from the custody of that court or of the person, institution, or agency to whose care such child shall have been committed, unless the court of appeals shall so order. If the court of appeals does not dismiss the proceedings and discharge the child, it shall affirm or modify the order of the juvenile court and remand the child to the jurisdiction of the juvenile court for supervision and care, and thereafter the child shall be and remain under the jurisdiction of the juvenile court in the same manner as if such court had made said order without an appeal having been taken.

"SEC. 35. Fees prohibited: No fee shall be charged for any service rendered by the clerk or by any officers of the court.

"SEC. 36. Jury; term of service: The jury for service in said court shall consist of 12 persons, who shall have the legal qualifications necessary for jurors in the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, and shall receive a like compensation for their services, and such jurors shall be drawn and selected under and in pursuance of the laws concerning the drawing and selection of jurors for service in said court. The term of service of jurors drawn for service in said juvenile court shall be for three successive monthly terms of said court, and in any case on trial at the expiration of such time until a verdict shall have been rendered or the jury shall be discharged. The said jury terms shall begin on the first Monday in January, the first Monday in April, the first Monday in July, and the first Monday in October of each year, and shall terminate, subject to the foregoing provisions, on the Saturday prior to the beginning of the following term. When at any term of said court it shall happen that in a pending trial no verdict shall be found, nor the jury otherwise discharged before the next succeeding term of the court, the court shall proceed with the trial by the same jury as if said term had not commenced.

"SEC. 37. Impaneling the jury: At least 10 days before the term of service of said jurors shall begin, as herein provided for, such jurors shall be drawn as hereinbefore directed, and at least 26 names so drawn shall be certified by the clerk of the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia to the said juvenile court for service as jurors for the then ensuing term. Deficiencies in any panel of any such jury may be filled according to the law applicable to jurors in said supreme court, and for this purpose the judge of said juvenile court shall possess all the powers of a judge of said supreme court and of said court sitting as a special term. No person shall be eligible for service on a jury in said juvenile court for more than one jury term in any period of 12 consecutive months, but no verdict shall be set aside on such ground unless objection shall be made before the trial begins. The marshal of said District, by himself or deputy, shall have charge of said jury, and may appoint a deputy for that purpose.

"SEC. 38. Judgments to be final: In all cases tried before said court the judgment of the court shall be final, except as provided in section 34 of this act.

"SEC. 39. Fines to be paid to clerk; deposit of receipts; statements: All fines, penalties, costs, and forfeitures imposed or taxed by the said juvenile court shall be paid to the clerk of said court, either with or without process, or on process ordered by said court. The clerk of said court shall, on the first secular day of each week, deposit with the collector of taxes the total amount of all fines, penalties, costs, and forfeitures collected by him during the week next preceding the date of such deposit, to be covered into the Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia. The said clerk shall render an itemized statement of each deposit aforesaid to the auditor of the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 40. Audit of accounts: It shall be the duty of the auditor of the District of Columbia, and he is hereby required, to audit the accounts of the clerk of the juvenile court at the end of every quarter and to make prompt report thereof in writing to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. The auditor of the District shall have free access to all books, papers, and records of the said court.

"SEC. 41. Separability of provisions: If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstances, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

"SEC. 42. Continuance in office: The judge and other officers holding office at the date of the passage of this act shall continue in office until the terms for which they were appointed shall expire and until their successors are duly appointed and qualified.

"SEC. 43. Title of statute: This act may be cited as the Juvenile Court Act of the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 44. Repeal: All acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed."

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the same do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. O'CONNOR of New York, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 4276, directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

On motion by Mrs. NORTON, a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, that will conclude the business of the Committee on the District of Columbia for today.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

THE LATE HENRY E. STUBBS

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my sad duty to announce to the House the death of the Honorable HENRY E. STUBBS, a Representative from the Tenth District of the State of California. Mr. STUBBS stood very high in the friendship and affection of the Members from our State and the entire membership of the House.

I offer a resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 142

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. HENRY E. STUBBS, a Representative from the State of California.

Resolved, That a committee of four Members of the House with such Members of the Senate as may be joined be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provision of these resolutions and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was agreed to.

The Speaker appointed the following committee: Mr. LEA, Mr. TOLAN, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. GEARHART.

ADJOURNMENT

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will conclude the reading of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ADMINISTRATION (H. DOC. NO. 158)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report on the operation of the National Industrial Recovery Administration, which has been prepared by those members of the Committee on Industrial Analysis who have no official relationship to the Government. They are Prof. J. M. Clark, of Columbia University, an economist; Mr. William H. Davis, of New York City, a lawyer; Mr. George M. Harrison, of Cincinnati, Ohio, president of the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks and also chairman of the Railway Labor Executives Association; and Mr. George H. Mead, of Dayton, Ohio, a manufacturer and former chairman, Business Advisory Council.

This report is based on an exhaustive study of the work of the National Recovery Administration, which has been in progress ever since June 1935, and which has been carried on since March 1936 under the direction of the Committee on Industrial Analysis, which I created by Executive order, which consisted of the four nongovernmental members who make this report and the Secretaries of Agriculture, Commerce, and Labor. The staff work for this Committee has been performed by the Division of Industrial Economics in the Department of Commerce.

This report presents the first adequate survey by an impartial group of the entire work of the National Recovery Administration, reviewing the objectives, the successes and failures of attainment, the administration, and the legal problems of the National Recovery Administration. The exhaustive collection of code histories, statistical information, and staff studies, which provided the basis for this report, are now available for further research by students interested in the many phases of the relationships between government and industry.

The report of the Committee should furnish invaluable aid to the Congress in the consideration and determination of vital legislative problems. This report, with its admirable, well-balanced weighing of controversial issues and its impartial review of complicated factual situations, provides a dispassionate consideration of a host of problems as to which emotion, self-interest, and prejudice have too frequently obscured the truth. It is worthy of the most serious consideration by the Congress and should be made available for widespread study and discussion. In my opinion, it will point the way to the solution of many vexing problems of legislation and administration in one of the most vital subjects of national concern.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 2, 1937.

ALLOTMENT OF PAY BY CIVILIAN PERSONNEL ABROAD

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

There is transmitted herewith a report of the Secretary of State and a proposed draft of legislation designed to authorize the assignment and allotment of pay of civilian officers and employees while performing duty outside the continental limits of the United States.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 2, 1937.

[Enclosures: Report of the Secretary of State; proposed draft of legislation.]

AGRICULTURAL INCOME—PRINCIPAL FARM PRODUCTS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report (in three volumes) with respect to agricultural income—principal farm products, and stating that supplementary reports would be submitted later, which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

COURT ORDERS RESTRAINING ENFORCEMENT OF LAWS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Chairman of the Railroad Retirement Board (S. Doc. No. 26), and a letter from the Administrator of the Works Progress Administration (with an accompanying statement) (S. Doc. No. 25), submitting the information requested by Senate Resolution 82 (agreed to on the 17th ultimo), calling for certain information concerning injunctions or judgments issued or rendered by Federal courts since March 4, 1933, in cases involving acts of Congress, which, with the accompanying statement transmitted by the Administrator of the Works Progress Administration, were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, protesting against the ratification of the so-called Argentine Sanitary Convention relative to importations of meats and livestock, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

(See concurrent resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. CAPPER on the 1st instant, p. 1665, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted by Division No. 192, Order of Benefit Association of Railway Employees, of Horton, Kans., favoring the enactment of legislation to repeal the so-called long-and-short-haul clause in section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, a petition has been forwarded to me by citizens of northern California aggregating 15,000 in number, dealing with the pending Court measure. I forgot to bring it with me, but I ask leave to present it and have it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the petition will be received when presented and referred as requested by the Senator from California.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I present for printing in the RECORD and appropriate reference a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the North Dakota Legislature favoring guaranty to the farmer of cost of production.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the farmers of North Dakota, individually and collectively, have taken an active part in demanding that the Congress of the United States guarantee to agriculture "cost of production plus a reasonable profit"; and

Whereas it is our honest conviction that no industry, business, or enterprise can long exist unless assured "cost of production plus a reasonable profit"; and

Whereas we have, by the passage of house bill no. 209, assured the business interests of our State "cost of production plus a reasonable profit" and have thereby furnished concrete evidence of our sincerity and abiding faith in the proposal: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota, That we hereby renew our oft-repeated appeal to the Congress of the United States to enact legislation which will guarantee to the farmers of America a price for their products which will assure "cost of production plus a reasonable profit" to the end that agriculture may be placed on parity basis with other industries; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be mailed to all Members in Congress from North Dakota, and we ask that they submit the same to both Houses of Congress for attention and action.

Mr. WAGNER presented a resolution adopted by the Fifty-sixth Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas previous conventions of the American Federation of Labor have recorded themselves as favoring the payment of prevailing rate of wages to all employees; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States in enacting the National Industrial Recovery Act on June 16, 1933, established the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, and provided for the payment of the prevailing rate of wages to be paid to all employees; and

Whereas pursuant to this act of Congress the Administrator of Public Works, the Honorable Harold L. Ickes, issued regulations providing that the payment of the prevailing rate of wages for services rendered be made to professional and semiprofessional employees, and defined such terms to include technical engineers, architects, and draftsmen; and

Whereas after the date of promulgation and taking effect of such regulations, including engineering employees, the Government of the United States and the city of New York, acting through their respective agents, the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works and the board of estimate and apportionment of New York City, entered into a loan and grant agreement whereby the Federal Government loans the city of New York 70 percent, and makes an outright grant of 30 percent of a total of approximately $25,000,000 for the completion of portions of the city-owned independent subway system, known as P. W. A. project N. Y. 2741, a self-supporting project; and

Whereas the city of New York employs their technical engineers, architects, and draftsmen on this project and pays their salaries out of funds provided by the P. W. A. Administration pursuant to the loan and grant agreement N. Y. 2741, dated May 17, 1934, and amended in 1935 to provide moneys with which to legalize payments of salaries of the technical staff; and

Whereas the city of New York fails to pay the prevailing rate of wages, and fails to pay the minimum equivalent rate of $1.20 an hour; and actually on this project reduced the salaries of their engineering employees in amounts equivalent to reductions of 20 to 40 percent, so that at present these salaries are now below the equivalent hourly and accumulating yearly salaries paid to technical men on Works Progress Administration relief projects: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this convention of the American Federation of Labor record itself as unalterably opposed to the use of Federal funds for payment of wages of employees as improper where such payments do not conform to the laws of Congress and the regulations issued pursuant thereto governing the use of Federal funds; and be it further

Resolved, That this convention of the American Federation of Labor urge the President of the United States and the Administrator of the Public Works Administration to direct full enforcement of the regulations regarding wages of engineering employees; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to President Roosevelt; Administrator Ickes; Senators WAGNER and COPELAND, of New York; and Mayor LaGuardia and Comptroller Taylor, of New York City, with the request that they cooperate in seeing that the engineering employees on P. W. A. project N. Y. 2741 receive the prevailing rate of wages for services rendered and to be rendered in accordance with the mandates of Congress, and as more fully detailed in claim previously filed with the Public Works Administration.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (S. 1500) authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to provide for the classification of cotton, to furnish information on market supply, demand, location, condition, and market prices for cotton, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 143) thereon.

H. R. 3620. An act authorizing a preliminary examination and survey of Mill Creek, a tributary of the Brazos River, in Austin County, Tex., with a view to the control of its floods; and

H. R. 3621. An act authorizing a preliminary examination and survey of Navidad River, Tex., with a view to the control of its floods; to the Committee on Commerce.

H. R. 4276. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to create a juvenile court in and for the District of Columbia", and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

H. R. 4286. An act to provide special rates of postage on matter for the blind; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

H. J. Res. 43. Joint resolution to amend Public Law No. 780, Seventy-fourth Congress, to authorize the acquisition of lands in the city of Alameda, county of Alameda, State of California, as a site for a naval air station and to authorize the construction and installation of a naval air station thereon, for the purpose of making a correction therein; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE

On motion by Mr. ASHURST, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the following bills, and they were severally referred to the Committee on Claims:

S. 684. A bill for the relief of the city of New York;

S. 973. A bill for the relief of the city of Baltimore; and

S. 1291. A bill for the relief of the State of Connecticut.

REGULATION OF COMMERCE BY AIRCRAFT—AMENDMENTS

Mr. McCARRAN submitted sundry amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by providing for the regulation of the transportation of passengers and property by aircraft in interstate commerce, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed.

AMERICAN NEUTRALITY—AMENDMENT

Mr. BONE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 51) to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war", approved August 31, 1935, being Public Resolution No. 67, Seventy-fourth Congress (S. J. Res. 173), as amended by joint resolution approved February 29, 1936, entitled "Joint resolution extending and amending the joint resolution (Public Res. No. 67, 74th Cong.), approved August 31, 1935", which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

SMALL MANUFACTURING INDUSTRIES

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 89), which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures:

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures be, and it is hereby, requested to report to the Senate as to the advisability of requiring the Secretary of Commerce to investigate and determine, for the information of individuals or organizations asking such information, as to the smallest capital, labor, and machine units with which, and the smallest distribution and population areas in which, articles of common use, to be specified by the parties seeking to be informed, may be profitably manufactured for sale, and to embody the result in replies to said parties and in bulletins for general circulation.

SEC. 2. That the Committee on Manufactures be, and it is hereby, requested to report to the Senate as to the advisability of requiring the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and determine as to the extent to which small factories may be operated in connection with farms of average size on the farm itself, in farm communities, in villages, or elsewhere, and to embody the result in bulletins for general circulation.

TREATY PROVISIONS CONCERNING RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF NEUTRALS (S. DOC. NO. 24)

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, directly in keeping with the issue as to proposed neutrality legislation pending before the Senate at this time, I am about to make a request for unanimous consent. Under the editorship of Prof. Francis Deak and Prof. Philip C. Jessup there has been undertaken, and now completed, an extended study of treaty provisions which define rights and duties of neutrals. The study deals with all treaties from 1778 to 1914. The study is one which I consider most valuable, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

REORGANIZATION OF THE FEDERAL JUDICIARY—ADDRESS BY SENATOR COPELAND

[Mr. ADAMS asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a radio address on the proposed reorganization of the Federal judiciary delivered by Senator COPELAND on Feb. 28, 1937, which appears in the Appendix.]

CROP INSURANCE—ADDRESS BY SENATOR POPE

[Mr. McGILL asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a radio address on the subject of Crop Insurance, delivered by Senator POPE Mar. 1, 1937, which appears in the Appendix.]

AMERICANISM IN ACTION—ADDRESS BY SENATOR LEE

[Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a radio address on the subject of Americanism in Action, delivered by Senator LEE on Feb. 15, 1937, which appears in the Appendix.]

RETIREMENT PRIVILEGE FOR SUPREME COURT JUSTICES

LINCOLN'S BIRTHDAY ADDRESS BY HUGH GORDON MILLER

[Mr. WAGNER asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address on Abraham Lincoln and Robert E. Lee, delivered by Hugh Gordon Miller before the Grover Cleveland Democratic Club, New York City, Feb. 11, 1937, which appears in the Appendix.]

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY—EDITORIAL FROM NEW YORK TIMES

[Mr. TYDINGS asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial published in the New York Times of Mar. 1, 1937, dealing with the reorganization of the Federal judiciary, which appears in the Appendix.]

BUREAU OF AIR COMMERCE—J. CARROLL CONE

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] gave notice yesterday that, if agreeable to the Senate, he would like to address the Senate upon the subject of reorganization of the judicial branch. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield for a brief statement?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in some newspapers, notably including the Washington Herald, there appears an erroneous press statement which, in justice to the officer referred to, should be corrected. The statement is to the effect that Col. J. Carroll Cone, Assistant Director of the Bureau of Aeronautics in the Department of Commerce, is being transferred to Europe because of criticisms of his official action made by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], or the committee which he represents, namely, the Commerce Committee. There is no foundation in fact whatever for that statement. The Senator from New York never said and never wrote anything of the kind, and the Commerce Committee never reported or made any such finding.

I would not mention this matter at this time if it were not for the fact that a manifest injustice has been done both the Department and Colonel Cone. Colonel Cone, may I say, is one of the best informed authorities on the subject of aviation to be found in our country. He won distinction during the World War when, in common with many other aviators, he took the chances of injury and death along far-stretched battle fronts. In all his record as a soldier in the air there is not one letter or one word which reflects on either his courage, his integrity, or his loyalty. He is, moreover, well known to everyone connected with the aviation service in the United States. He enjoys the confidence, the respect, and the admiration of his associates in the Government service. His record is one of courage, efficiency, and loyalty.

This statement is made in order that justice may be done a deserving and upright officer.

Let me add further that for some time it has been in contemplation by the Secretary of Commerce and others connected with the aviation service in that Department to dispatch to Europe a capable and well-trained officer for the purpose of making a study of conditions as they affect commercial aviation in the various countries of the Old World. Colonel Cone asked for that assignment; it has been granted him; he regards it as in the nature of a promotion; and he is going to his new duty with the confidence not only of his associates in the Government but of every one connected with aviation in the United States.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has made this happy allusion to Colonel Cone. I wish to say that our Committee on Aviation has made an extensive and painstaking search into the causes of air disasters. We have studied the possibility of a better organization of the Government to deal with aviation. During our hearings and research we had occasion to canvass the record and capabilities of every man in the Department of Commerce having any connection whatever with the subject.

I wish to quote from the report of our committee, a report made here on the 20th of June 1936, and found at page 10359 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. We were speaking of various officials of the Department of Commerce. Coming to Colonel Cone, one of the assistant directors of the Air Bureau, the committee said this:

> Concerning Colonel Cone, we have no recommendation to make. He came through the ordeal without criticism.

I wish to endorse and underwrite everything said by the Senator from Arkansas about Colonel Cone. I regard Colonel Cone as a great aviator and as a great administrator. In his direction of regulations of the Department of Commerce, relating to safety in the air, in a very important position, Colonel Cone has rendered distinguished service. I should consider it a real calamity if anything happened that might be regarded as anything else than a promotion of this able official. He deserves promotion. He deserves the confidence of Congress. He deserves the confidence of the country.

I am happy to endorse everything said by the Senator from Arkansas with reference to Colonel Cone. I wish I might be able to say as much about some others in the Department of Commerce. I cannot do so. However, in Colonel Cone's case I can say in all truth that he is an able, capable, loyal, and devoted servant of the United States Government.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I shall not delay the Senator from Kentucky, because he gave notice that he would speak this morning. I wish to remind Senators, however, that there is still pending before the Senate, as the unfinished business, Senate Joint Resolution 51, dealing with the renewal or extension of the existing Embargo Act, which, under its own terms, expires May 6. The joint resolution proposes certain additions to existing law. I have no intention of attempting to interfere with the Senator from Kentucky, because he is pursuing an ordinary custom of this body, but I hope that after he has concluded his speech Senators will allow us to continue consideration of the pending joint resolution.

The Senator from Kentucky is acting entirely in accord with a custom of this body, a custom which I wish did not exist. I have taken advantage of the custom very often, but thoughtlessly. There is no rule of this body which requires a Senator to address himself to the measure pending before the Senate at the time, and therefore the Senator from Kentucky is entirely within his rights. It would seem, however, that it is left to each Senator to determine the propriety of addressing himself to some question that is not before the Senate.

I hope that after the Senator has concluded his speech those who have the desire to answer him, as there probably will be some, will defer their answers until after the Senate has an opportunity to act on the unfinished business. There is an emergency for action on the joint resolution. There are some other matters which possibly will not come before the Senate for some time. The result is that there will be plenty of opportunity in the Senate to discuss anything desired when there is no urgent or pressing business pending before it.

I simply say this because I hope the Senator's speech, which I know will be able, as his speeches always are able and informative, will not cause a general debate on the subject, which, of course, if persisted in could last until the 1st of May, the time of the expiration of the existing Neutrality Act.

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I feel that I should apologize to the Senate for interrupting the debate on the neutrality joint resolution now pending before the Senate to speak on a different subject. However, let me assure the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] that if he had even suggested to me yesterday that he preferred that I should not take the time this morning to discuss another subject, I would have yielded very gladly. A postponement of my remarks would make no particular difference to me.

I favor the neutrality measure, although the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] yesterday expressed exactly my views about neutrality. I shall vote for the joint resolution and shall gladly do so. I may assure the Senator from Nevada, therefore, that there is no intention on my part to delay unduly the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, when any measure is submitted to the Congress affecting the welfare of the people there should be a fair and just approach to the question with the sole object in view of reaching a conclusion whether the measure is within the constitutional power of Congress to enact it, and whether if enacted it will accomplish that which will result in the greatest good to the greatest number.

That the proposed reform of the judiciary is fraught with far-reaching consequences if it should be written into the laws of the Nation must be conceded. I have refrained from making any statement as to my position, or as to how I would vote, until I could give the questions involved that careful consideration which they deserve. It has been necessary to review not only the history of this Nation as it relates to the judiciary but the history of other nations. This I have done to the best of my ability, and such thoughts as I may utter now have been matured in no hasty manner.

In common with nearly all of the legal profession I have the highest respect for all courts. I believe they are most honorable and conscientious in their efforts to construe the laws of the country and to decide cases where individual rights are involved. I do not call in question the good faith, or the integrity, of any member of the Court. The message of the President recommending the reformation of the judiciary came as a surprise to me, and my natural inclination, at the time, was to disagree with his recommendations, and most assuredly I should have done so if I had been compelled to act without making the necessary investigation.

I approach the matter now conscious of only one desire, and that is to cast a vote, if the time comes when such opportunity is afforded me, on the side that I believe to be right. I shall not try to satisfy the party to which I belong, the administration now in power in Washington, my constituents, or my friends. I shall try, before God and my own conscience, to satisfy myself. Believing that I can do this, I have given more than usual attention to the question. Like a lapidary, I have attempted to hold it up and get the reflected light from every angle. I have weighed one conclusion against another to find out on which side the best interest of the people lies. All of us who make up the membership of the Congress have thrust upon us a great responsibility, and we are not helped much one way or the other by public clamor.

There come to my desk many times during the day letters and telegrams. Some of them shock and surprise me. They show, on their face, that the senders are controlled by malice and hatred. It is strange when questions of great solemnity are to be decided that the malicious take advantage of their opportunity to pour out their wrath upon someone. A large group of the citizens who have communicated with me have taken occasion to bitterly attack the President of the United States. Their malice is not concealed. They hate him, and they characterize his message as "unheard of", "outrageous", "dictatorial", "liberty destroying", and by other more severe epithets. He is referred to as a traitor to his country, as one who is false to his oath of office, as one who is desirous of destroying the Republic. I have been made to wonder if it has always been true that the man who sought to serve the poor and look after the welfare of the helpless and extend the pleasures of life to the many as against the few has always been traduced and maligned. The unreasoning hate and the outspoken malice convince me that those who hate the President—and there are many—are using this measure as an opportunity to destroy him and the cause for which he stands. Yet as honestly as I know how I have sought, in my own mind, not to be influenced by such communications, although they are not calculated to enable one to approach such an important matter calmly and judiciously.

There is another group who communicate with me, and they do not approve the measure; but, in courteous and dignified terms they give their reasons why they do not look with favor upon it. They are helpful. They are entitled to have their suggestions considered in the light of reason. They are the men and women who keep their heads; and it is largely to them, and others like them, that my remarks are addressed. To the Pharisees of the first class that I have mentioned I have nothing to say other than that I hold them in contempt. To the second group I express my appreciation for their help.

There is a larger group, some requesting me to support the President's program, and others protesting against my doing so. Most of their messages have been inspired by others. There are those who have earnestly urged upon me, with much reason, that I should support the program. They have been helpful, and their suggestions have been helpful.

As for the larger group who appear to know nothing about the questions involved, whether they be for or against the program, their communications have little effect other than to clog the mails, and to make more difficult intelligent investigation of the affairs which need my constant attention. I know, of course, as I have the direct information from many sources, that those who oppose the plan have perfected an organization which seemingly reaches from one end of the country to another. They are active in inducing those whom they can influence to send telegrams, write letters, or sign petitions. We who have been Members of the Congress for some time too well understand these methods to be influenced by them.

I may say that that sentence was written before the statement of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] was made yesterday about propaganda.

It appears to me that the members of the legal profession are very greatly disturbed. That is easily understood. Their training leads them in that direction. They have been taught to respect courts. But I desire here to make the statement that many of my friends in the profession who write me show such a total lack of knowledge of the history of the Supreme Court that I would advise them immediately to procure some good history of that court and read it with care and discrimination. If they will do so, they will find they are mistaken when they say that the President is violating his oath to support the Constitution. No constitutional question is involved. If they will read what other Presidents have said—for instance, Jefferson, Madison, Jackson, John Quincy Adams, Martin Van Buren, James Buchanan, Abraham Lincoln, to come no further toward the present—they will find that Mr. Roosevelt has dealt more gently with the Supreme Court than any President mentioned. Not one word has he said that could be construed as a reflection upon the integrity of the Court. That is quite different from what Jefferson said about Marshall as to the "twistification of the law", or when he felt that it was a time for congratulation when "old Cushing died", or when Jackson said:

> Marshall has written his opinion; now let him enforce it.

There is no need to multiply the language which had been used about the Supreme Court by Presidents when they disagreed with the opinions of the Court. If one desires to look for criticism of individual members of the Court, let him read the dissenting opinions of other members down through the ages. See what the beloved Holmes said about his brethren, or what Taney said, or Story, or Harlan, or I might include others who are still members of that august body. I disagree with every statement that has been made calling in question the integrity or good faith of the Supreme Court. I also disagree with the soundness of many of the opinions which have been written by it.

There are certain questions which must be answered by myself to myself before I can support the proposed legislation. The first question that I ask myself is whether the recommendation as to the Supreme Court is necessary. Is it true that we need additional members of the Supreme Court, or that some of those who are members of that Court ought to resign or retire? The necessity for the proposed legislation must be determined by the best evidence that can be secured. Such evidence must be educed from known facts, and should not be manufactured out of the mind alone.

It is suggested that six of the Justices of the Supreme Court have passed the age of 70. Does age alone disqualify them from rendering faithful service as members of the Court? Is there any reasonable basis for believing that any or all of these Justices should retire for the common good? When I was a member of the Kentucky Court of Appeals I wrote an opinion for that court, from which I quote as follows:

> Other witnesses say that they do not believe that any man who has passed the age of 75 years is competent to attend to his own business. They must be in error on this point. If literature should be deprived of the rich contributions of those past the age of 75 years, much that has ennobled, inspired, and enlightened the world since civilization had beginning would be blotted out; if from the events of history their part should be subtracted, much that has set the world forward would be lost; if their discoveries in science should be omitted from the sum total of human knowledge, there would be darkness where there is now light; if from systems of jurisprudence principles of law established by them should be eliminated, there would be imperfection where there is now perfection; and if from the governments of the world their work as statesmen should be obliterated, there would be weakness where there is now strength. Old men have wisdom that the young know not of. Let it not be written by this court, therefore, that age always dries up the fountain of the mind and destroys the Godlike attributes of man.

Recently that opinion has been called to my attention by many of the lawyers in my State. I adhere fully to what I said then; but perhaps, to use a slang expression, I "overspoke." In the main, however, I believe that what I said in that opinion is true. Age alone does not always disqualify a man from doing great things. It must be conceded that age often renders a man inefficient and destroys or lessens his ability to grasp the ever-moving problems of national life. If there is any body of men in the Nation who should look with clear vision into all questions coming before them, it is those who make up the judiciary, State and National.

A distinguished jurist of Kentucky who afterward became a Cabinet officer, Judge George M. Bibb, as an introductory of one of his volumes of Kentucky Reports, expressed better than I have ever seen it expressed elsewhere what he deemed the necessary qualifications for a judge. I am glad to do him the honor of including his statement, made a century ago, at this point:

Disagreements constantly arise as to what the laws require, permit, or forbid, and, as no man is fit to decide in his own case, judges are appointed to decide all controversies.

The office of judge is a high trust and confidence, most intimately connected with personal liberty and the rights of property. The wealthy desire a well-appointed judiciary, because they wish the rules of property to be known and steady. And yet they are not likely to suffer so often by a weak judiciary as men in middling and lower circumstances. Favor and influence are the never-failing attendants on riches—and they can procure the most learned and eminent counsel. These advantages of the wealthy can be held in check only by like influences or by a court superior to such influence. Before a weak court, in a controversy with men in moderate circumstances, the wealthy have the advantage. To men in moderate and indigent circumstances a well-appointed judiciary is all important. The possession of wealth is the possession of the means of protecting that wealth from unjust invasion; the rights of acquiring property, of labor, of industry, and of personal liberty want the protection of courts of justice. When the facts are fairly stated, the deficiency of counsel is supplied by the intelligence of the court.

If judges are ignorant and dull, they are more liable to the impressions of able and ingenious counsel. As in the material world, the softer substances yield in collision with the harder; or as the gross pig of metal is fused by the application of heat, and fashioned by the hand of the skillful artist, so in the intellectual world the softer and inactive yield to the more vigorous and the gross, leaden, uninformed mind is melted by the fire of genius and molded by eloquence to its purpose. If judges are learned, they are more likely to be impartial; prejudice and partiality are the creatures of ignorance; they are dispelled by learning, like the fogs of night by the rays of the sun. Judges should be learned in theory and in practice, in abstract principles, and in matters of fact, in books or letters, and in the book of human nature, in morality, and in the ways of men and their modes of transacting business. They should be of an independent cast of mind and of solid integrity, for they are called to decide between men in power and the people, between men of wealth and influence and of friendless poverty. They should have such salaries as are adequate to their comfortable and independent subsistence, that so they shall be under no necessity to divert their minds from their duties nor engage in that commerce, traffic, or speculation which would involve them in many contracts and make them feel an individual interest with one or other of the parties before them. They should be studious, because legislation is not stationary, but progressive. They should be patient and diligent, that causes may be fairly investigated and yet decided with as little delay as consists with a fair trial.

I agree fully with what he said, and I believe that any legislative body is justified in doing all it may legally do to see that members of the judiciary measure well up to the standard prescribed by Judge Bibb. If one is incapacitated by age, ill health, or by infirmities of mind, he cannot measure up to that high standard, and if he can be legally replaced it follows, as a matter of course, that he should be. More than 100 years ago Senator Truman Lacock, of Pennsylvania, made this reference to the Supreme Court:

The judges are to be old men when appointed, and the infirmities of old age will every day increase, and as the useful and vigorous faculties of their minds diminish, in the same proportion will their obstinacy and vanity increase. Old men are often impatient of contradiction, frequently vain and susceptible of flattery. These weaknesses incident to old age will be discovered and practiced upon by the lawyer willing to make the most of his profession, and located in the same city, holding daily and familiar intercourse with the judges. And thus, your Court may become subservient to the Washington bar. The judges, bowed down by the weight of years, will be willing to find a staff to lean upon; * * *."

Judge Story was one of the great Justices of the Supreme Court. He wrote a letter to Daniel Webster in 1824 advocating increase of the number of Judges of that Court so that the Judges might be numerous enough "to bring to the Court an extensive knowledge of local jurisprudence." His further reason for advocating an increase in the number of Judges was because, "it is scarcely possible that they can do the duties long, as business increases upon them."

In 1823, when the then Chief Justice of the Court was 71, another Justice 74 and another 64, another ill and another new in his position, Daniel Webster wrote:

I have as yet reported no bill on the judiciary but incline to think we shall recommend a partial system of circuit judges. If we had more confidence as to the course the appointing power would take, we might act differently.

Charles Warren, in The Supreme Court, says that—

Finally in 1826 the situation of the Court became such that some form of relief by legislation became imperative.

In order to relieve the situation by legislation, because of the infirmities of the Court on account of age and ill health, Daniel Webster, that great champion of the Supreme Court, introduced in the House a bill providing for an increase in the number of circuits to 10, with 3 additional Supreme Court Judges, and Mr. Webster, with his great ability and influence was able to secure the passage of the bill through the House. Martin Van Buren, later to become President, introduced the bill in the Senate.

Mr. Warren states that the proposed increase in the number of Supreme Court Justices was to conciliate the Western States, and that it would have lessened, if not destroyed, their antipathy to the Supreme Court. Mr. Warren, however, is quoting from a letter written by Jeremiah Mason to Daniel Webster. Daniel Webster, in replying to that letter, with all the facts and circumstances before him, expressed the opinion that the number of Justices should be increased, and that two of them should be appointed from the West. So we see that the great Webster, the outstanding Whig of his time, the defender of the Supreme Court from every attack, reached the conclusion that when some of the members of the Court were old and others incapacitated by ill health and inexperience, there should be an increase in the number of the Justices to allay popular feeling against the Court. The bill was not only passed in the House, but it was passed in the Senate, with an amendment attempting to limit the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, and as a result it died in conference. Soon thereafter the number of Justices was increased. So the President is not without precedent for the recommendation which he has made.

An important public man, in writing of Judge Cushing, who was incapacitated by age when he was a member of the Supreme Court, made the statement that those who were of the opposite political party from the President at the time had deliberately induced Judge Cushing to remain on the bench so that the then President could not fill the vacancy. Can any right-thinking man in the exercise of his reason believe that it was proper for a Judge to be induced to remain on the bench so that his vote might be counted on a particular side of public questions? Not only did Congress have the power to do something about it, but its failure to take some step to place someone on the Supreme Court who could see to it that questions were decided by Judges who were adequate for the decision was most reprehensible.

Justice Johnson, an appointee of Jefferson, in writing to Jefferson in response to some criticism in the method of preparing the opinions of the Supreme Court, offered as a reason why seriatim opinions were not delivered was because two of the Judges, by reason of age and ill health, were unable to write, and that another one of the Judges would not, or could not, write anything. It is beyond dispute that Judges have remained on the bench when they were incapacitated on account of age. If such a condition should arise in the future, or if it exists now, the easiest and the simplest plan would be to provide for the appointment of an additional Judge. Justice McReynolds took occasion to say in one of his dissenting opinions:

> While an "overspeaking Judge is no well-tuned cymbal", neither is an amorphous dummy, unspotted by human emotions, a becoming receptacle for judicial power.

It makes no difference what may be the cause of a Judge becoming an "amorphous dummy", if he does become such, and does not remove himself from the bench, there should be some law whereby the public may be protected against his failure to properly discharge his duties.

The difficulties of securing the resignation of Justice Grier are perhaps fresh in the memories of all of those who take an interest in such matters. Considering the question, then, alone on the matter of age, it would appear that there would be nothing unusual in authorizing the President to appoint an additional Justice when one has passed the retirement age. I believe that many of the legal profession, judging by the communications which I have received, are unaware of the fact that almost 20 years ago, carrying into effect a recommendation of the then Attorney General, who is now Justice McReynolds, the Congress enacted a law which now applies to the district courts and the circuit courts of appeals. There are about 300 Federal judges, and the law mentioned applies to 291 of them, if there are 300, and does not apply to the other 9.

It is true that the law vests in the President the power to appoint an additional judge when the sitting judge has passed the retirement age, if the President finds that he is not capable of fully discharging his duties. It could hardly be said that the suggestion of the President is revolutionary when he requests that the same law be extended to apply to the Justices of the Supreme Court. It is true that no President has exercised authority to appoint any judge because the sitting judge had passed the retirement age; and the entire proposal of the President, as it relates to the appointment of additional judges, simply extends the provisions of the law to the Justices of the Supreme Court, and makes it mandatory that an additional Judge be appointed when the prescribed conditions attain. To my brethren of the law who seem to be so concerned about this matter, as far as this particular point is concerned, let me suggest that they withdraw statements they have made that the proposed legislation is "unheard of", "unconstitutional", and all other similar suggestions.

There are stronger reasons, however, in my judgment, than the age of the Justices, which would justify such legislation if there is nothing else in the way. After a Judge has served the public until he is eligible for retirement he ought to be given an opportunity to have some of the good things of life in his old age. Naturally, if there is no provision for the appointment of someone to serve with him, he will perhaps serve on, feeling that the knowledge of the law which he has obtained should be used as long as he is capable of using it. If, however, he were aware that his presence was not necessary on every occasion, but that he did have the right to appear and vote on important matters, he would retire more willingly, feeling that he might be of service to his country if the need for his wisdom and experience should become necessary.

The President is not without precedent from high authority in advocating the retirement of Judges. The present Chief Justice is on record, I understand, as advocating compulsory retirement at the age of 75. Former Chief Justice Taft thought that Judges should be compelled to retire when they had reached the retirement age, and many of the outstanding jurists and lawyers in the United States have taken that position. It is the rule that prevails in the business world. I hardly think that any great corporation, striving to keep up with the changing scenes in commerce, would be satisfied to have a board of directors a majority of whom had passed the age of 70 years. There are still other reasons why additional Judges should be appointed at this time without doing violence to a well-ordered judicial system.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWARTZ in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I point out to the Senator that, as I understand, there is nothing in the bill sent to the Congress by the President which would take any of the Justices who are over 75 years of age off the bench. They would still be on the bench, and would not retire if the bill were enacted. Therefore, so far as getting rid of them because of the imperfections or infirmities of age is concerned, they will still be on the bench, even though six other men were appointed. So there would not be any elimination of the present Justices because they were unable to act; they could still act and pass on cases.

Mr. LOGAN. That is all very true, I may say to the Senator from Maryland, but the force and effect of every vote would, of course, be lessened depending on the increased number of Judges on the Bench. In this connection I am only trying to say that if we had need for their wisdom they could be called in, and they would feel that they were still having a part in the Government. Otherwise they could leave the bench and enjoy some of the good things in life before they died.

Mr. TYDINGS. I appreciate that suggestion. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. LOGAN. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not think the Senator contends even by inference that the Judges on the Supreme Bench who are now over 70 years of age are infirm, incapable of performing their duties, unlearned in the law, or have any of the defects to which he has previously alluded. For example, Chief Justice Hughes, I think, is 74, and he has decided that some of the recent measures are constitutional and that some are not. He has not had any static side in the controversy. That is also true with respect to some of the other Judges on the Supreme Court bench. For example, three of the elderly Justices who normally vote with the administration on economic measures were united with the opposition in declaring the N. R. A. unconstitutional. So that there is no static division of political philosophy on the bench, because in the N. R. A. case they were a unit, while there have been differences in connection with some of the other measures which have been submitted to them.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course, Mr. President, I cannot agree with the statement of the Senator from Maryland that there is no division of political philosophy. It is true that the N. R. A. case was decided unanimously. But I believe that if a measure involving constitutional question were submitted by the Senator from Maryland, and he knew that it was going to the Supreme Court, he could take out his pencil and write down the names of three Judges who would be on one side of the question and four Judges who would be on the other.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to interrupt to ask a question at that point. Is that due to age?

Mr. LOGAN. I will say in answer to the Senator from Georgia, as I said in answer to the Senator from Maryland, that I do not believe anyone on the outside can tell just what effect age has on a mind in the consultation room. The Senator from Georgia has been on the bench. I do not know whether or not he has served with old men, but I have. I have seen some men who when they were on the bench were men of very brilliant minds, but when they got into the consultation room their minds were not so brilliant. They wanted to repeat. I have seen such a judge who wanted to go back to precedents that he had announced perhaps 20 or 30 years ago, and it seemed to me his mind was static. I do not know whether or not that condition prevails with respect to the Supreme Court.

Mr. GEORGE. What I wanted to ask the Senator was whether, in his opinion, a man's view on economic forms or theories is necessarily at all related to age?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know whether it is or not. I do know that my view on economic conditions has changed rather radically in the last few years. I came to the Senate having always been extremely conservative; I think I am now; but I have had things just thrust upon me since I came here. I have seen things in a light in which I never previously saw them. I had moved in a small sphere, among lawyers, among judges. I came in contact with things that closely affected me. When I got out and took a survey of the whole United States and the whole world it did not take me long to find out that I had had a very limited view of events that were occurring in the world.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Does not the Senator from Kentucky understand that the Supreme Court disclaims any attempt on its part to put its economic views into its opinions?

Mr. LOGAN. The Judges of the Supreme Court do so disclaim; but, of course, as was said by Justice Holmes in one of his opinions, or I believe it was in a speech, we all know, if we are reasonable men, that there is no court anywhere which is not affected to some extent, either consciously or unconsciously, by its political, social, and economic views.

Mr. MINTON. Let me ask just one more question which is prompted by what the Senator from Maryland asked the Senator from Kentucky, as to whether or not the things he had to say applied to any of the Judges now upon the bench, and then proceeded to show how they were performing their duties, although they were old. Is it not a fact that one of the Judges on the bench beyond 75 years of age has not written one opinion a year for 5 years?

Mr. LOGAN. So it has been stated.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to point out to the Senator that the late Justice Holmes was an elderly man and continued to serve on the bench. The same thing is true of Justice Brandeis at the present time. Justice Holmes in his time held and Justice Brandeis now holds the liberal view to which the Senator has referred. Justice Holmes was a very old man. Justice Brandeis is an old man. I think Justice Brandeis is nearly 80 years old, and Justice Holmes served until he was nearly 90. Chief Justice Hughes, I think, is about 74, and in the majority of cases which are in dispute he has taken the so-called liberal view. If that be true, we find that three of the six men over 70 years of age have recently divided equally on economic questions, three elderly men being against the liberal view, three elderly men being for the liberal view. So that age, by the record itself, is proven to have no effect on the economic outlook of the Judges themselves.

Mr. LOGAN. I very readily concede that that is true as a general principle. I have seen some judges who were not more than 50 who had no sense and never did have. I have seen some men past 75 years who were great jurists and whose opinions could always safely be followed.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more observation?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to put it into the form of a question and ask the Senator if the observation I have just made as to men over 70 years of age on the bench likewise applies to men on the bench who are under 70 years of age, namely, Justice Cardozo and Justice Roberts, who at different times have been on opposite sides of the same economic question? So whether their age is over 70 or under 70 men are quite apt, as the Senator has fairly conceded, to look at things differently even though they are of the same age.

Mr. LOGAN. I agree fully with the Senator about that. I do know that the division now existing not only in the Supreme Court but in other courts is over the question whether the laissez-faire doctrine should be continued or whether we should get away from it. That is the main point of division existing in the minds of courts everywhere, as I see it.

Mr. TYDINGS. I shall not interrupt the Senator again. I should like to conclude what I said with the further observation that the argument in favor of adding six Judges to the six who are now on the bench and who are over 70 cannot be predicated upon the point of economic outlook. Neither can it be proven that the position taken by certain Judges is due to age. If it be true that the Judges over 70 years of age divide 50-50 as to economic outlook, the point that the age of Justices is a material consideration goes up in smoke.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not think the point goes up in smoke at all, but since I am discussing that further on in my speech I will not be drawn into discussing it now, although the Senator from Maryland has spoken of a matter which I should like to discuss at some length. The Senator is simply wrong about it. I should like to convince him if I can. But I will go a little further with respect to that at a later point in my discussion.

Mr. President, I spoke of the effect of social, political, and economic views of a court upon its opinions. I do not believe that any student will deny that the views of judges do affect the opinions of the court.

Mr. Warren, in his book, The Supreme Court—and he is a conservative if ever there was one—made the statement:

> The Court is not an organism dissociated from the conditions and history of the times in which it exists. It does not formulate and deliver its opinions in a legal vacuum. Its judges are not abstract and impersonal oracles but men whose views are necessarily, though by no conscious intent, affected by inheritance, education, and environment, and by the impact of history, past and present; and, as Judge Holmes has said: "The felt necessities of the time, the prevalent moral and political theories, intuitions of public policy, avowed or unconscious, even the prejudices which judges share with their fellow men, have had a good deal more to do than the syllogism in determining the rules by which men should be governed."

I think all of us will concede that to be true.

Mr. Warren is a conservative of the conservatives. He recognizes that a court cannot dissociate itself from the conditions and history of the times in which it exists. If the lines of division in a court have become hardened by combat and the minds of the judges have become impervious to argument, either by reason of inheritance, education, or environment, then does it not seem perfectly reasonable that those who are more free from bias and who come fresh from the "impact of history" should be placed on the Court in order that a better cross section of the Nation may consider the important questions that come before this great Court?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the Senator takes a position which is so fair in his discussion of the subject that he will concede that all the new men coming on the bench will bring with them the effect of their environment, their education, and their prejudice, and what not, because neither he nor I shall ever live to see the day when a perfect man walks upon the face of the earth. Any six judges who are put upon the Supreme Court Bench will be the same kind of human beings as were the judges who have been put on the bench ever since the Court was organized.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course, that is true, and that is as it should be. We can find no perfect judges; we can find no perfect men. But the point I am attempting to make is that the members of the Court may reach such a stage of fixed opinion that they must be stirred up in some way so the public need may have a fresh review. What I am trying to say, although I may repeat myself in saying it at this time, is that we ought to know whether the Court is going to follow the interpretation of the Constitution of the great Marshall or whether it is going to follow the interpretation which the followers of Jefferson said it should follow.

The only thing the President is asking in his message is that the interpretation placed upon the Constitution by Chief Justice Marshall shall be followed. For 36 years—aye, for 60 years from the beginning of the Government—we had one interpretation. Since about 1885 we have had another interpretation. Other Members of the Senate do not know, and I do not know, what legislation can or will be upheld by the Supreme Court. Somebody is wrong. The minority members of the Court may be wrong or they may be right; the majority members may be wrong or they may be right. I do not know who is wrong or who is right, because the responsibility is not upon me to decide it; but I say there should be an increase in the number of Justices from different walks of life, with different social, political, and economic views, so that all questions may be fairly and intelligently reviewed and we may reach some conclusion so that the Congress may legislate. But, Mr. President, I will proceed.

As I was saying, we ought to place new men on the Court in order to obtain on the Supreme Bench a better cross section of the Nation, so that the Justices may consider important questions as I have just outlined. If it be true, which I deny, that some of the Justices of the Supreme Court have the same antipathy toward the President of the United States and his policies as is exhibited by distinguished men in the higher walks of life, then is it unreasonable to say, if they have passed the retirement age and allow their antipathy to operate on their minds, that another judge should be appointed who would at least neutralize the vote of him, if there should ever be such, who has set his face like flint against any social or economic improvement in the conditions of the country? At present the Justices are not drawn in fair proportion from different sections of the country, as Webster in his day thought they should be. A majority of the Court comes from three States in the East—Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania. Is the destiny of the Nation to depend on what these five men think the Constitution means? It may be that in 1907, when the present Chief Justice of the Supreme Court declared—

> We are under a Constitution, but the Constitution is what the judges say it is.

The country was shocked. Nevertheless, the statement was and is true, and will be true in the future. It is always true of a written constitution. There is no trouble, perhaps, with the Constitution, but the interpretation of the Constitution, sometimes one way and sometimes another, is what has brought about the great confusion that now prevails in the minds of those who have considered the matter. I want to be a good Senator and to vote for laws that I believe are constitutional, but I must confess that I do not know what law will be upheld by the Supreme Court or what law will be declared unconstitutional. No man can tell. It follows, then, if we could have a Court more fairly representative of the different sections of the United States that we would be better satisfied with the opinions. There have always been divisions among the members of the Supreme Court as to the proper interpretation of provisions of the Constitution; there always will be; but who can say whether the five are right and four are wrong or whether the four are right and five are wrong?

The objection that the Court would be too large if it should ever be increased to 15 members, in my opinion, is without any merit at all. If we had 6 judges when we had 4,000,000 people, it would not be unreasonable to have 15 judges when we have 130,000,000 people, and especially is that true when the wealth of the country and the causes of litigation have increased in a greater proportion than the population. In my opinion, there would never be 15 members of the Court. There might not be more than 9. So, on the question of whether an increase in the number of Justices is necessary I have reached the conclusion, based upon the evidence afforded by history, that such an increase, under the plans outlined in the bill, is justified. I have not pointed out that the number of Justices has been increased from time to time and has been reduced. Perhaps the motives for making the increase, or the deduction, were bad, as usually there were some political reasons behind such changes. We should forget about them and confine our consideration exclusively to whether, under present conditions in the Nation, the Congress would be justified in authorizing the President to appoint an additional judge for each of the sitting Justices who are past the retirement age.

Another question which addresses itself to the mind of any man who thinks seriously about the proposal of the President is whether it is an effort to pack the Supreme Court for the purpose of securing favorable opinions on the constitutionality of legislation which he proposes. If that is the purpose of the proposed legislation, I should oppose it now and always, as I do not believe that the independence of any court should be interfered with in any way by public officials or by private individuals. I do not say that the opinions of the courts are never interfered with by outside influences, but, in my judgment, if it ever happens, it is indeed a very rare occurrence. Among the many communications I receive in my office a vast majority of them express opposition to the "packing" of the Supreme Court. I am persuaded that many of those who write, having been induced to do so by others, have very little knowledge of what is meant by the expression "packing the Court." However, there are many serious-minded men and women, public spirited and deeply interested in the public welfare, who appear to have the opinion that the President is attempting to secure control of the Supreme Court so that opinions favorable to his views may be written into the law. I believe, on sober second thought, that those who desire the question considered seriously and intelligently will perhaps, on more mature consideration, reach the conclusion that there is little, if anything, to justify their fears.

I had a letter from an old and valued friend a few days ago, one of the most distinguished lawyers in my State, and one with whom I have been associated in practice in many cases, and while he expressed opposition to the proposed legislation, he took occasion to say that if the proposal of the President had been submitted in normal times it would possibly have passed without much notice and without much opposition, but he said the psychology was bad. I think we must admit the truth of that suggestion. The Supreme Court has determined several questions adversely to the views expressed by the President and by Congress, and the presumption would naturally follow when there is a proposal to increase the membership of the Court that the object was to secure more favorable opinions to the views of the President and Congress than had been rendered in the past. I think we may assume that perhaps that is true, but that does not necessarily mean that the President desires to pack the Supreme Court.

Again we must examine the question in the light of the past. To call the roll of those who have made the charge that a President was attempting to pack the Supreme Court would be like calling the roll of immortals in American history. The number of Justices on the Supreme Court has been changed, I believe, six times, and I think without an exception the charge was made vehemently in the public press by statesmen, by jurists, and by men in every walk of life that the purpose of the change was to pack the Supreme Court and secure favorable opinions from it. Calm thought will lead to the conclusion that there was never any reason for such charges, and that they were wholly without foundation. Those who made them at the time were more or less sincere, although the charge was, perhaps, made by many, as it is now, purely for political reasons.

When the makers of the Constitution provided in that instrument for a judicial branch of the Government it was provided that it should consist of one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress might, from time to time, establish. The number of the members of the Supreme Court was left exclusively to the judgment of the Congress. Those who say that the proposal of the President to increase the number of Justices, if the legislation should have that result, was not first submitted to the country and the country had not determined that it was an apt time to increase the number of Justices, advance an argument that must fall to the ground before any legally trained mind. The Constitution, which we all revere, made a provision which left it to Congress to determine how many Justices should constitute the Supreme Court. So there has been no election since that time when the people did not know, or at least should have known, that the Congress could determine the number of Justices which should constitute the Supreme Court.

As I have said, I believe the number of Justices that should constitute the Supreme Court was changed 6 times in 80 years, or an average of about 1 change every 13 years. It has now been 68 years since there has been a change in the number of Justices on the Supreme Court. The Nation, as well as the world, has been made over in that long period of time, and certainly it cannot be said that the Congress has been hasty in changing the number of Justices if it should adopt the recommendation of the President. But as Patrick Henry said on one occasion, "Our feet must be guided by the lamp of experience." If the tremendous clamor which has broken out from time to time in the history of our Nation about changing the number of Justices, and that such a change would pack the Supreme Court, has proven to be without any foundation, then may not a reasonable man suppose that the same thing would happen if there should be a change at this time? It is only necessary to refer to any history of the Supreme Court, and the legislation in relation thereto, to be readily convinced that in the past 147 years the clamor about the Supreme Court and the charge that it was to be packed proved to be without foundation.

That the Supreme Court has been a storm center through much of the history of our country must be admitted. George Washington was diligent in his efforts to select the members of the first Supreme Court, and it was his hope that his selections would prove equal to the demands made upon them. He did not do so well. In fact, he did rather poorly if we consider his appointments in the light of history. The Supreme Court did not amount to much in Washington's time, and neither did it count much in the national life until about the close of the administration of John Adams.

The Democrats, led by Jefferson, had swept the Federalists out of office. Those who in that day did not believe to any great extent in the rule of the people were greatly alarmed. They had lost the Presidency and the legislative branch of the Government. Perhaps it was John Marshall, the most outstanding Federalist of all, who conceived the idea of erecting a citadel out of the Federal judiciary. After the election of 1800, and at what later came to be known as a "lame duck" session, a new judiciary act was passed by Congress, creating Federal judges right and left, and Mr. Adams, with his Secretary of State, Mr. Marshall was engaged in what they thought was packing the Federal judiciary. Marshall worked as late as he could trying to get the commissions in the hands of the appointees, but he had to quit in time to be appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.

It was thought, perhaps, by Mr. Marshall, as well as Mr. Adams and those who agreed with them politically, that the Federal judiciary had been thoroughly packed, and that under the dominance and influence of Mr. Marshall, who became the Chief Justice, the country could be saved from the consequences of doctrines held by Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and their followers. The Supreme Court came into prominence as the result of politics, and those who railed against what had been done doubtless thought that the judiciary should be abolished, or at least made impotent. This started a fight over the Federal judiciary that was not ended until Andrew Jackson, another opponent of the Federal judiciary, ended it in his administration.

It would be illuminating perhaps, but not important, to follow step by step the efforts of the Federalists to pack the Federal judiciary. The Supreme Court at that time had not become the "sacred cow" of the United States. Jefferson's Congress repealed the act creating the new judges, and, in order to carry out its purposes, it saw to it that the Supreme Court should hold no meeting for 14 months. When the Supreme Court met, instead of its having been packed to carry out the views of the Federalists, it calmly and deliberately upheld Jefferson's law repealing the Judiciary Act passed in the closing days of the Adams administration. There had been great clamor about the packing of the Court, and it was doubtless believed by Mr. Jefferson and his followers that the Court set up by Adams and Washington would declare the act passed by the Congress repealing the Judiciary Act unconstitutional. The Supreme Court had not been packed. It was thus early demonstrated that it could not be packed.

Let us pursue the matter a little farther. Jefferson was against the Supreme Court, or rather against the interpretation of the Constitution as Marshall had construed it. Jefferson said violent things about the Supreme Court. I hesitate to mention the fact that if Jefferson were living today he would be standing squarely behind the present Supreme Court, as he fell out with Marshall because Marshall construed the Constitution like some of the followers of the President now think it should be construed, and Jefferson was against Marshall for the reason that he thought the opinions should be written as they have been during the past few years.

A strange thing we find here. A Democratic administration is now fighting for the interpretation of the Constitution of a Marshall, and a Republican Supreme Court is vigorously combatting that position and holding out for an interpretation of the Constitution such as Jefferson contended for. This but serves to illustrate that it does not take a packed Supreme Court one way or the other to bring about disagreement of the proper interpretation of the Constitution.

Somewhere along the line the Jeffersonians and the Hamiltonians passed each other, and the Hamiltonians are now on the side the Jeffersonians once occupied, and vice versa. This fact alone is sufficient to show that environment, education, and many other outside matters have their influence upon all courts. The tide of time brings changes, and new occasions bring new duties, and the Supreme Court has, throughout the years, except on occasions, kept step with progress. When it has got out of step there has been an upheaval on the part of the public, but the Court has never been packed.

Jefferson waited some time for an opportunity to appoint a Justice. When the time came he appointed a young man named Johnson, of Virginia. He had acted, no doubt, in making the appointment, in accordance with the statement of Charles Warren in the Supreme Court, when he said:

> Appointments to the Court, moreover, have not been made from a cloister of juridical pedants, but from the mass of lawyers and judges taking active parts in the life of the country. Presidents, in selecting judges, have been necessarily affected by geographical and political considerations, since it has been desirable that the Court should be representative (so far as practicable) of the different sections of the country and of the leading political parties.

In fact, I believe that important statesmen in that era rarely took a position that the President should not take these things into consideration, and Jefferson doubtless desired to place a Justice on the Court who saw eye to eye with him. But it was not long until it was found that Justice Johnson was lining up with Chief Justice Marshall in his interpretation of the Constitution. There was a failure to pack the Court.

Justice Story was appointed by a Democrat, and again it was thought that perhaps the Court had been packed, but those who know the life history of Justice Story know what a great judge he really was. Instead of his espousing the cause of Jeffersonian democracy, he lined up with Marshall, to the dissatisfaction of the Jeffersonians.

Daniel Webster reached the conclusion that there should be an increase in the number of Justices of the Supreme Court, and he advocated an increase of three members, but he expressed the fear that the Court might be packed. There was so much opposition to the Court, however, that he attempted to get a bill through Congress increasing the membership by three and very nearly succeeded. He thought the appointment of the new Justices would allay the opposition to the Court throughout the country. The appointment of new Justices was not brought about until during the administration of Andrew Jackson. The old warrior was an opponent of the Court and in violent opposition to its opinions. The members of the Court whom he appointed promptly lined up with Marshall in the interpretation of the Constitution, and before Jackson went out of office the number of Justices had been increased, and he appointed the new ones. The Court, so it was thought by the Democrats, had been thoroughly packed, but nothing happened. It is true that Taney, as Chief Justice, succeeded in modifying some of the opinions of Marshall, but, in the main, things went on as before until the Dred Scott decision. For a period of 53 years the Supreme Court had held no act of Congress unconstitutional until the Dred Scott decision, but when the tumult and the clamor were over it was found that the Supreme Court had not been packed.

During Mr. Lincoln's administrations he appointed a Court in the days of the bitterest controversy this Nation has ever seen, and now, if ever, one would think that the Court had, indeed, been packed. It was so charged. But when that Court appointed by Mr. Lincoln came to consider the Legal Tender cases it calmly refused to be packed and declared the Legal Tender Act unconstitutional. This brought the country face to face with bankruptcy, and Congress, perhaps for the only time in its history, apparently attempted to pack the Court by making it possible for President Grant to appoint two members. While no doubt he sought to select men who were in accord with his thought about the matter, I am convinced that much unjustified criticism has been made of President Grant about these appointments, although the Legal Tender cases were later upheld. Perhaps no one may approve what was done by the Congress and President Grant, but certainly no one has any just cause to complain because Grant saved the country from greater evils.

President Wilson appointed his Attorney General a member of the Supreme Court, and perhaps it may be said that he thought his Attorney General shared the same liberal views that he himself shared, but such proved not to be the case. Most conservative Presidents have appointed men who turned out to disagree with them, and most liberal Presidents have appointed men who also turned out to have different views from the one who made the appointment. It is needless to multiply examples, but, if we believe the truth of history, we must reach the conclusion that in the past it has been impossible to pack the Supreme Court. It must be borne in mind also that if the Justices past the retirement age should actually retire, the President will have no greater opportunity to appoint members of the Supreme Court than other Presidents have had. If they should not retire and additional Justices should be appointed, is that such a shocking state of affairs as some seem to think it is? I believe it has been recognized that new men on the Supreme Court bench were lacking in experience, and if, before the older Justices retire or pass on to their rewards, they should have new men to serve with them, those who have been recently appointed might greatly profit by the wisdom of the old and thereby better fitted to discharge the duties of their high office.

It is said by some that it would be a dangerous precedent to increase the number of Justices, as it might put the idea into the head of some other President. The possibility or probability of increasing the number of Justices has existed since the adoption of the Constitution. No precedent is needed to put the idea into the head of a President that the number of members of the Supreme Court may be legally changed. That argument, of course, is without merit.

Why is it that it has been impossible in the past to pack the Supreme Court? It is because of the method of their selection.

Those who charge that this legislation would result in packing the Supreme Court make a very grave charge against the President of the United States, against every Senator, and against anyone who might be appointed. It would require a corrupt Executive to name to the Supreme Court a man who had in advance agreed that he would adopt any particular line and interpretation of the Constitution. I do not believe there has ever been a President who would bargain about such a matter, and if there is now one, or has ever been such a President, he is corrupt and should be impeached.

I do not believe that those who charge that the proposed legislation has for its main object packing the Supreme Court mean what they say about it. Not only do they charge that the President is corrupt and unworthy to hold the high office which has been bestowed on him so overwhelmingly by the people, but they charge that the majority of the Senate is corrupt, because any Senator who would vote for any man as a member of the Supreme Court believing that he was committed to any particular line of action in the determination of questions to come before him would not only be corrupt, but he would be an unmitigated scoundrel.

I resent the charge, if I should vote for the proposed legislation, that I am corrupt and unworthy to hold the office to which I was elected. I believe that every Senator here, regardless of politics, would vote only to confirm such a man as he believed would faithfully determine questions coming before him after having been satisfied that he was otherwise qualified for the position. Moreover, no man who could, or would, be considered for membership on the Supreme Court would think of committing himself in advance. If he should do so, he would be unworthy of the position. If he were that type of man, the Nation generally would know it.

My conclusion, therefore, is that the President has no intention of packing the Supreme Court, and that if he did have such an intention he could not do it. It is not an easy thing for a man to be confirmed as a Justice of the Supreme Court, as is shown by the records of the past. Even a militant minority could prevent it. So, in my judgment, after giving the matter mature consideration, I must say that the point made against the proposed legislation that the President desires to pack the Supreme Court is without merit.

I now come to a question on which I desire to give free expression to my thoughts. It is one of the main questions that have very greatly modified my views about the recommendation of the President.

It has been said that during the recent Presidential campaign little discussion took place about the matter now before us. It is true that there was little public discussion regarding it, but it was whispered about that the President would ask for an increase in the membership of the Supreme Court. I did not think he would. In fact, I did not think he should, and at the time his message was read to the Senate I was impelled to the feeling that he had made a mistake. I know that it is never safe to reach a conclusion hastily.

In nearly all of the letters that come to my desk, I find the statement that the President desires to be a dictator. If that were true, neither I nor any other Senator would vote for the proposed legislation. Again it is necessary to go back of the words and find what forms the basis of the recommendation which has been made. I cannot explore the mind of the President, and I can only reason about the matter as I imagine he did, and if, through a process of reasoning, I can satisfy myself on the question, I ask no more. Let me say that I am not trying to satisfy any person on earth except myself. I have to live with my conscience the rest of my life, and I do not want it waking me up in the nighttime, whispering that I did something that I knew at the time I should not have done. So I shall consider seriously the charge that the President wants to become a dictator, although I can hardly think it has been seriously made.

The way I look at the matter is this: The President loves humanity. He loves democracy. He would save democracy if he can, and he would prevent a dictatorship if it is within his power. That is my deliberate judgment. Why should he want to be a dictator? He has 4 years to serve in office, and then none but a fool would believe that he will be the head of our Nation any longer. If my views are right about it, we shall have other elections in the same orderly way that we have had them in the past, but if my conclusions are sound as to the importance of this proposed legislation, and we should reject it, it may be that we shall never have another election in this Nation.

These are solemn words, but they express my judgment. The men and women of America should think seriously on this question, and try to think it through and find the light. We ought to know the truth, and I do not know any way to find out what the truth is other than to apply the faculties of our minds, based upon our knowledge and the experiences of the past, to the problems which confront us.

Can any of us forget the dark and dreary winter of 1933? I confess now that I thought we were rapidly approaching the end of our national existence. I had little hope for the salvation of the Nation. I have been a student of history, and I believe I know the causes that have led to the downfall of nations as great as our own. An article of mine was published in a magazine 3 or 4 years ago. I meant to write another, but I did not. I was afraid, and so expressed myself, that the time had come when we could not carry on the affairs of our Government, and that we should be broken up by forces over which the general Government had no control.

When I looked to the great West I saw the farmers in despair. They were hopeless. They were in revolt against the economic order. They had reached the point where they were willing to congregate together to resist the laws of organized society. Twenty-cent corn, 30-cent wheat, 3-cent hogs brought upon them such a state of mind. I looked to the cotton farmers of the South and saw that they were sullen and despondent. Five-cent cotton had made them so. The tobacco farmers in the Carolinas, Kentucky, Virginia, and Maryland had seen their hopes dispelled. The interest on mortgages could not be paid. The families of the farmers could not be cared for; and, judging by the history of the past, it seemed to me that revolution among the farmers was on the way.

That was not all. The millions of men and women who labored were out of employment. They were dumb and hopeless before the calamity which had over taken them. Their children were crying for bread; and their wives, pale and desperate, were doing the best they could to protect the household. Men tramped the streets looking for work, and there was no work. The seeds of discord had been sown. There were marching armies of unemployed. The factories were still. Great industrial centers were so quiet that one could hear the chirp of the cricket or the song of the katydid at night. There was a gloom that could not be penetrated by many; and these conditions are the conditions which bring dictatorships. The Bourbons had brought about these conditions through their short-sighted policies. They have not yet learned anything. They were brought to their knees then because they had pulled the temple down upon themselves. They were whispering then that only a dictator could save for them a part of what they had.

I do not wonder now that I looked upon the scene with despair and gloom. I honestly believe that the President of the United States saved our Nation from absolute destruction. Swiftly he moved after he came into office. There had been no movement of any kind for the relief of conditions, but the people listened to his promises in his inaugural address and in his message to Congress. Recommendations were hastily made, and legislation was hastily enacted, much of it imperfect because there was no time to wait for perfection. Laws were passed for the relief of farmers, home owners, laborers, industries, railroads, and on every subject where it was thought that it was necessary to save the Nation from complete destruction. The Congress, regardless of politics, stood squarely behind the President. The Members knew the difficulties. They have been called "rubber stamps", and the Bourbons have applied other epithets to them; but no nation affords a greater example of patriotism than that exhibited by the Members of the Seventy-third Congress.

Under the operation of these laws we saw the farmers restored to a reasonable condition financially. The products of their farms were increased in value to such an extent that they looked up again. The laborer was cared for. Industry had attention. Attention was given to social security. Home owners were afforded an opportunity to save their homes. The hungry were fed. The naked were clothed. The homeless were cared for, and even those who had no helper were the objects of tenderest care. By reason of this legislation and the program which was put into effect, there has been the most remarkable recovery that any nation has ever made. No one disputes it. The newspapers carry the message every day. The banks have been made safe. Stocks and bonds that were thought worthless have been restored to their normal worth. Prosperity came like a great sunburst breaking through the clouds. Everyone has said that the depression is over, but we have just now reached the crisis. The depression is over; but a few mistakes, and we go back to the conditions which prevailed in the beginning of 1933. We cannot again pull the Nation out of a depression. We have about reached the limit of our credit; and if that condition shall return, there will be a complete disorganization of our national life, and there will be a dictator or worse.

These are my views, and these are the things I am most seriously considering.

I believe that the President, looking ahead just a little bit, can see the danger and what has brought about the danger. The laws for the benefit of the farmers have been destroyed by adverse decisions of the Supreme Court. The laws for the benefit of labor have been or will be destroyed by the same Court. The methods used by the President and his Congress to save the people have been held illegal. It is true that they have been so held by a divided Court. Whether the majority or the minority was right, I do not know; but I believe that the President must know that unless the Congress can legislate for the protection of labor, for the protection of the farmer, for the protection of all those who must be protected, the benefits that have been secured so far will be lost and when they are lost we shall slide down into a depression with a rapidity that few can foresee.

How, then, can it be prevented? It must be done within the Constitution. The President has proposed that the membership of the Supreme Court be treated as the membership of every other Federal court, and that he be allowed to appoint additional Justices so that they may calmly consider the problems, thinking perchance that the Supreme Court may find within the Constitution powers which so many of the Justices of the past have said dwell there, to enable the Congress to save the Nation.

Is anyone so foolish as to believe that the farmers of the South will ever be willing to accept 5 cents per pound for their cotton, or that the tobacco farmers will accept 5 cents per pound for their tobacco, or that the wheat farmers will accept 30 cents per bushel for wheat, or that the corn farmers will accept 15 cents per bushel for corn? Does anyone believe that labor can be put back where it once was, that the family of the laborer can be compelled to live in squalor and want because fair wages cannot be secured for him? If anyone believes that such conditions can be made to prevail again, he does not know the temper of the American people. Any effort to save the Nation is worth while. It should be saved. While I would not point to the example of President Grant as one to be followed—he tried by his acts to save the Nation. Presidents do not count for much. The few statesmen who make up Congress and other important positions in the Government, when placed by the teeming millions of the people that we ought to serve, do not count for much.

God knows that I want to be right in what I do. I have been troubled and made unhappy by the charges loosely hurled that the President wants to be a dictator. Why should he? Is he not greater than Stalin, Mussolini, and Hitler? Does he not enjoy the confidence of his people to a far greater extent than any ruler on earth? He is the popular idol of the American people. This was shown by the most overwhelming majority ever given any President, both by popular vote and in the electoral college. In his heart he appreciates this confidence, and he wants to justify it. He knew the attacks that would be made upon him when he made this recommendation, and a man less bold and with less courage would prefer, I think, to accept the plaudits of the multitude while the ship of state drifted on toward the precipice, rather than to incur a fight which he knew would be fierce, and on the result of which he knew would depend the success or failure of his administration. He wants no power except what may be bestowed upon him freely through the love of his fellow citizens. It is unthinkable to me that anyone could believe that he seeks to destroy democracy. He knows that democracy cannot live except where the people are free and happy and have equal opportunities before the law to serve their God, protect their homes, care for their families, and have a fair share of the good things of life.

So the charge that the President is seeking to establish a dictatorship in the United States, so far as I am concerned, falls to the ground. Not only is there no merit in the charge, but there is no one who believes it. It comes from those who seek advantages to which they are not entitled, and they use it to create fear in the hearts of men and women of the Nation. Sometimes I think it would be well to let the Bourbons have their way, so that they might destroy themselves. It is hard to save a man from himself and then have ingratitude and only ingratitude for what you have done for him.

I have never posed as a prophet, but the United States of America cannot live unless we can find some way to enact such laws as will bring protection, peace, and happiness to all of the people of the Nation. I have considered the matter as carefully as my limited knowledge will allow me to, and I cannot find a better way than that which has been suggested by the President. I have sought diligently to think through the points made by the opposition against the program and I have analyzed the points to the best of my ability, so that I might determine whether they were well taken. So far I have expressed my opinion on three of them. There are yet others, and I shall now express my views about them.

Strange as it may seem, apparently the opinion which prevails among the majority of the Members of the Congress, as well as the public, is that something should be done to confer greater power upon the Congress, or rather the general Government, in connection with matters relating to commerce and the general welfare of the Nation. Those who disagree with the President's suggestion in many instances take the position that the issue should be submitted directly to the people in the form of a proposed constitutional amendment, and that the States should be requested to ratify such a proposal. Obviously there are difficulties in the way. These suggestions have been made from the beginning of our judicial system, but rarely has anything been accomplished.

In the first place, the Congress would hardly agree on what should be submitted in the nature of an amendment. In my opinion, it would be impossible to satisfy two-thirds of each branch of the Congress with the language in which the proposed amendment should be expressed. There are now nearly threescore proposals pending in the Congress, and there is no possibility of enumerating the opinions about any of them. There are those who desire that Congress be given absolute authority to legislate for the promotion of the general welfare, and that the Congress itself should be clothed with authority to determine what is for the general welfare.

Other proposals relate to an amendment to the commerce clause of the Constitution; while others relate to the due-process clause. Many relate to limitations on the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court; while others relate to limitations on the jurisdictions of inferior Federal courts. Some propose to allow Congress to veto an opinion of the Supreme Court; while others propose to force the retirement of Justices of the Supreme Court at a certain age. Many measures of major importance confronts the Supreme Court at this time, and to know definitely what may be the result in any one of these cases it would be necessary to have an amendment to the Constitution covering each particular question.

The question of establishing a balanced, safeguarded, controlled national economy, a planned system of industry and finance, a system of production and distribution, questions relating to capital and labor, agriculture and industry, creditors and debtors—these great questions confront the Congress, and eventually will reach the Supreme Court. What Congress may do towards the promotion of the general welfare, the establishment of minimum wage laws, and dozens of other questions that are social in their nature rather than purely legal, must be passed upon by the Supreme Court. Many questions have arisen, until it is necessary to find dormant powers within the Constitution which may be called into being, or additional powers must be conferred upon Congress to legislate touching the important questions which must be decided now. Not only must two-thirds of each branch of the Congress agree upon the form of such amendments as it deems necessary, but the 48 States, through their representatives, or at least three-fourths of them, must agree that the proposed amendments are sound.

The life of the Nation is more important than mere forms and procedure. I must agree with the opinion expressed by Justice Holmes, that if the States do not have the power to do those things which are imperative to insure a continuance of the life of the Nation, the Federal Government must have such power, because the power must be lodged somewhere.

Those who advocate amendments to the Constitution are well within their rights, if the program can be carried out in time to protect the Nation from what must inevitably result if there be not found some means to enable Congress to meet the pressing questions constantly before it. If the public will not wait and if the Government cannot afford to wait, some means other than by amendments must be found, if possible, within the Constitution.

The eleventh amendment was adopted after 5 years' consideration to overturn a principle which had been announced by the Supreme Court. We are moving too rapidly now to wait even 5 years. When the Supreme Court reversed its earlier opinions and held unconstitutional the law imposing a Federal income tax, it took 20 years to reverse that opinion by a constitutional amendment. When the Child Labor Act was declared unconstitutional by the Court, an amendment was soon thereafter submitted to the States, and for 20 long years organizations interested in the public welfare, statesmen, and citizens interested in decent and good government have been making an effort to have that amendment ratified by the necessary 36 States. They have not reached their goal up to this time. If the prohibition of child labor in factories cannot be enacted without a constitutional amendment and such an amendment cannot be secured in 20 years, what reason does anyone have to believe that, with the opposition to progress which we find in the minds of some, necessary amendments can be secured to give Congress the authority to do that which it is obviously necessary for it to do. Perhaps no way can be found, but the suggestion made by the President opens an opportunity for such a way. Many insist that his proposal is unconstitutional, but they have evidently given the matter little thought. The Constitution allows Congress, as above stated, to fix the number of Supreme Court Justices. If there should be an additional number constituting that Court, perchance some of them might join with the minority of the Court and, as Marshall did, discover implied powers within the constitutional provisions that would enable the Nation to go forward to the great destiny which we believe is in the future.

Those who insist that there should be an amendment rather than an increase in the number of Justices seem to believe that those appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate would be mere puppets rather than men such as Justice Brandeis, Justice Stone, Justice Cardozo, and I might include Justice Hughes as another. The mere fact that judges might be appointed who held views in harmony with those great judges and in harmony with the views expressed by the great Marshall affords no basis, it seems to me, for a charge of corruption and bad faith against the President and against the Senate and those who might be appointed. His appointees might not agree that the President's views are in harmony with their own.

At a time rather similar to the present time, in the days of Jackson, the Supreme Court was in serious trouble with the people, and Jackson perhaps had an opportunity to appoint all the members of the Supreme Court, with one or two exceptions. At that time political bitterness ran high. But the Justices appointed by Jackson were never accused of any effort to write into the laws of the Nation the theories of Jackson about government. For more than 20 years the only important departure made from the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall was a modification of the Dartmouth College case decision by the opinion in the Charles River Bridge case. If we should attempt to bring about reform through constitutional amendments, we might confer upon the general Government more power than we would like for it to have. On the other hand, we might believe that we were conferring certain powers upon the general Government, and the Supreme Court might fail to find that we had done so.

There is one other thought which I will express in this connection, that those who are really opposed to the Supreme Court and would like to see its powers greatly curtailed, if not destroyed, seem to favor a constitutional amendment. I prefer to place myself in the class with those who believe that the Constitution, if interpreted as Marshall interpreted it, will show that it has within its provisions life-giving power sufficient to save the Nation. I do not believe we can wait for a constitutional amendment. This Nation is now at the crossroads. We must go forward under wise leaders who will lead in the interest of all the people, or else we must go the other way. Whatever is done must be done quickly.

The difficulty with many of those who believe that the status quo should be maintained is that they have not stood on the watchtower and surveyed the people of the Nation as a whole. At the present time matters are very well in hand, and the country itself may be saved through an exemplification of wise leadership, but if the matter gets out of hand and the people run riot, as they have done before, in their efforts to take from the Federal courts the power which the courts have generally wisely used, trouble may come which we do not foresee.

I do not know of any reason why such constitutional amendments as Congress may agree upon should not be submitted to the States, but I see every reason why we cannot afford to await the action of the States if we can take action without it. I believe in the Supreme Court, and I do not believe that it is necessary to curtail its powers, or limit its jurisdiction. It may get out of step with modern progress, but a change in personnel in the past has saved it, and it may do so again. At least it is worth trying in a wholly constitutional manner.

I must discuss briefly the one point which weighs most heavily on my mind. I need not quote statements from distinguished men of the past such as Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, John Breckinridge, James Buchanan, Martin Van Buren, and James Madison, to prove that there has always been a strong opposition to the Supreme Court throughout all of its history. From 1803 until the death of Jefferson he continuously protested against the powers claimed by the Supreme Court. His language was strong in his expression of fear that the Court would destroy the Republic. He said so in so many words when he wrote his friend William C. Jarvis, as follows:

> It is a very dangerous doctrine to consider the judges as the ultimate arbiters of all constitutional questions. It is one which would place us under the despotism of an oligarchy. * * * The Constitution has erected no such single tribunal, knowing that to whatever hands confided, with the corruptions of time and party, its members would become despots.

The reason Jefferson was so strongly against the Supreme Court was because of the decisions of Marshall in which he expressed his theory of constitutional interpretation. Jefferson thought that the Supreme Court should adhere strictly to the plain language of the Constitution, while Marshall and his Court found in the treasure house of a practical constitution such power as would enable the general Government to function as it was necessary for it to function if it should solve the great problems confronting it even in the beginning of the Government.

In the opinion of McCulloch against Maryland, Marshall said:

> This provision is made in a constitution intended to endure for ages to come, and consequently would be adapted to the various crises of human affairs.

Mr. Jefferson and his followers did not believe that, and the position of Jefferson and Madison and others was combated by Marshall in this quotation from Gibbons against Ogden:

> Powerful and ingenious finds, taking as postulates that the powers expressly granted to the Government of the Union are to be contracted by construction into the narrowest possible compass, and that the original powers of the States are retained, if any possible construction will retain them, may, by a course of well-digested but refined and metaphysical reasoning founded on these premises, explain away the Constitution of our country, and leave it a magnificent structure, indeed, to look at, but totally unfit for use.

From 1803 until his death in 1835 Marshall was almost continuously in conflict with the Jeffersonians, and the feeling against the Court became so intense at times that it appeared that the Congress and the States might destroy the powers of the Supreme Court. Can it be forgotten that Pennsylvania refused to recognize the validity of an opinion of the Supreme Court and called out its troops to prevent its enforcement? Can it be forgotten that Virginia was in open revolution against the opinion of the Court; that Kentucky defied the Court and refused to obey its mandates; that Georgia, Ohio, Maine, New Hampshire, and other States openly defied the Supreme Court and its opinions, and through resolutions and by other means it was made known that an effort would be made to dissolve the Union because of the opinions of the Supreme Court?

It was because of this feeling against the Court, and to allay it, that Daniel Webster proposed a bill in Congress to increase the membership of the Court by three. Jackson saved the Supreme Court because of his action when South Carolina defied the Court and threatened to withdraw from the Union. Perhaps a majority of the States at that time were equally incensed against the Supreme Court. Jackson was given the power to appoint additional Justices, and by reason of vacancies he practically made over the Court, and when Taney became Chief Justice it was thought that the Court, made up of Jackson's appointees, would repudiate the opinions of Marshall. Of course, it was prophesied then, as now, that if Jackson were given authority to appoint additional Justices liberties would be destroyed, that the Constitution would be violated, that the Court would be packed, and I believe there is no adjective used now by any of those who protest that was not more vigorously used at the time Jackson sought to appoint members of the Supreme Court. He did appoint them, and the Court passed into an era of strength and respect under the leadership of Taney.

It is true, in a few instances, that the people of some of the States, as well as statesmen, continued to rail against the Court, but no serious thought found expression until the Dred Scott decision in 1857. The furies broke loose again, and the Supreme Court was again endangered.

Then came on the War between the States, followed by the reconstruction era, and the Court had no definite or fixed plan. It may be that it was packed by President Grant, as some contend, but, be that as it may, the Supreme Court lost prestige in that third period of our history. It neither followed the Jeffersonian doctrine nor the Marshall doctrine in the interpretation of the Constitution.

In the eighties the Court began to regain its prestige and veered back toward the Jeffersonian doctrine. Things went on very well with it until the income-tax decision, and again there were those who thought the Supreme Court was a useless appendage in governmental functions. From that time until recent years it gained in prestige, but when the real test came, within the last few years, it was discovered that the Supreme Court is looking more to the Taney period than to the Marshall period and that it is imbued with the Jeffersonian interpretation of the Constitution rather than with Marshall's interpretation. Those who were against Marshall should be for the present Court, but those who look upon Marshall's opinions as correctly interpreting constitutional provisions must disagree with the present Supreme Court.

I have briefly alluded to these things as the basis of the point which will have more to do with my final conclusions than any other one thing. The number of those who are against the Supreme Court and who would have it so limited in its powers and jurisdiction that about all that would be left would be for it to settle controversies or suits between or among individuals are legion. The numbers have been growing, and they have been awaiting an opportunity to strip the Supreme Court of its important powers, those powers which are necessary for the perpetuity of our institutions.

I do not belong to that group. I am for the Supreme Court. I cannot find much sound reasoning in the protests of those who say that the Supreme Court is one of the checks and balances set up by the Constitution. There is not much merit in that statement. The executive branch of the Government does have some control over the legislative branch, and the legislative branch does have some control over the executive, and the judicial branch has control over both, but neither of the branches has any control over the judicial branch other than to kill it off, and that would not be wise. It is true the President appoints the members, but that gives him no control over them. So I dismiss the unthoughted suggestions of those who say that the President's plan would destroy our system of checks and balances as being without merit.

But I cannot dismiss from my mind the conviction which I have that perhaps a majority of the American people want something done to the Supreme Court or to the Constitution which in the long run would not be best for the Nation. These may be termed the leftists. They are what might be denominated extreme liberals. On the other hand, there are the rightists, or the extreme conservatives, who disagree with the President's proposal. Many of them are honest and sincere and believe what they say, and they should be made to see the danger before it is too late. In their fight on the President's proposal they are but helping those who are opposed to the powers vested in the Supreme Court. In fact, they are helping those who would make radical changes in the Constitution. They do not know it, but they have no power to accomplish anything other than to assist the leftists in their efforts to change the Constitution and to change the power of the Supreme Court.

I do not want the powers of the Supreme Court changed, and only as a last resort should the Constitution be changed. But those whom we may denominate extreme conservatives are valiant to bring about that which they most oppose. That can be readily seen by one who has kept closely in touch with the tendencies of the times. Unless some reasonable, sane, and constitutional means is found to prevent a change in the Constitution and the powers of the Supreme Court it will come, and come with exceeding rapidity. This I see very clearly. The great masses of the farmers, regardless of what anyone may say, feel, whether justly or not, that the Supreme Court has denied them benefits which the Government could confer upon them if it were not for the Supreme Court. There are teeming millions of laborers in factories, shops, stores, and mines who sincerely believe that they have been discriminated against by the Supreme Court, and if it should be necessary radically to change the Constitution they would favor it, and they would favor circumscribing the power of the Supreme Court to a very great extent.

As I have said, those who are so conservative that they believe nothing should be done at this time are apt to bring upon the Nation the destruction of the very things for which they contend. At such a time what is a Chief Executive to do who has burning love for democracy and who loves the Nation as greatly as any man who has ever lived in it? He seeks to save the Supreme Court and the Constitution by proposing a method of dealing with these vital questions that is within the Constitution, and that can do no violence to the opinions of any man. The only possible objection that has been offered to his plan is that he will pack the Supreme Court, and as I have said before that cannot be done, and he has no such intention. Those who make that assertion, of course, are wholly without proof. The extremists are taking advantage of what the conservatives are doing in an effort to work their own will. Those who have been most violent against the opinions of the Supreme Court are most violent against the plan of the President. The President as usual is moving in the middle of the road, neither listening to the voices to the left of him nor the voices to the right of him, but he is listening to the voices of the past which are saying to him, "This is the way, walk ye in it."

I know how hard it is for the good lawyer, knowing the traditions of his profession and believing in the perfection of constitutional law, to do anything but oppose what he believes is an effort to pack the Supreme Court. We can only say to them that they are mistaken. I have been one of them, at least in their adherence to traditions. Many of the old ideas that I entertained have been upset by the swift-moving current of progress. It is hard to break away from views of the past, but the dead hand of the past should not control actions in the future unless the past has principles that will meet ever-changing conditions. The past must hold no mortgage on my thoughts of today. I can only appeal to those whom I know are honest and sincere to go deeply into every phase of this question and not to be bound by hastily formed opinions, or by opinions which they have inherited or which have become a part of them, without serious thought and consideration.

It is my deliberate judgment that we will lose all of those things that we hold most dear if we further turn a deaf ear to the millions who are looking to the present administration to bring into being a new era, a new day, where all shall share in the glories of the greatness of our liberty. Democracy ought not to be killed by old friends, but democracy will die if we fail to find some way to guide it over the storm and stress of the present period. We have seen what has happened to democracies in Europe because the governments could not be made responsive to the will of the people. If we adopt the plan of the President we may not win, but at least those of us who believe in the Constitution and the Supreme Court will know that we have done our best to hold back the tide that may engulf the Constitution and the Supreme Court as well.

Many of those who protest against the enactment of the bill proposing a reformation of the judiciary offer reasons that I am afraid are not supported by facts. Some of my very close friends, for whom I feel the most sincere friendship and the truest affection, have most earnestly importuned me to oppose this proposed legislation. I know how honest and sincere they are. Generally they say that it will destroy the liberties of the people.

I do not see how this legislation could interfere with the liberty of the people in any manner. It should be remembered that the Constitution was not adopted to make secure the liberty of the people, but rather to secure the blessings of liberty, which is quite a different thing. Liberty, unrestrained and unregulated, may be a curse rather than a blessing, and our Constitution sought not to protect liberty but to secure its blessings for all of the citizens, insofar as it was possible for the Government to secure such blessings for its people. If the liberties of the people were not destroyed when President Taft named two-thirds of the members of the Supreme Court or when President Jackson named more than that many, why would the liberties of the people be destroyed if another President should be allowed to name less than one-half of the members of the Court? I am persuaded that no one really believes that an additional number of Justices would have a tendency to destroy liberty, but the recommendation of the President came at a time when there was a sharp conflict between the Supreme Court and the Congress over certain legislation intended to secure the blessings of liberty and the general welfare of the people, as the Congress believed.

The recommendation was seized upon by those who are opposed to the President, as well as by many of his friends, to create the impression that he had but one thing in view, and that was to appoint members of the Supreme Court who would do his bidding. He is not that kind of a President, and there is nothing in his life or conduct to afford the slightest basis for such a belief. I believe there is no writer of importance on public questions who has ever thought that it was a crime for a President to select members of his own political party to fill positions on the bench. It has not always been done, but, generally, when it has not been done it was because the appointing power realized that politics might have something to do with opinions and someone from the opposite political party was appointed to maintain the balance of the Court. The President has always appointed the Justices to the Supreme Court. The Senate has not always confirmed his appointments. A long list of outstanding jurists failed of confirmation in the Senate.

As I have previously said, the contention that liberty will be destroyed is founded upon the belief that the President and the Senate are unpatriotic, that they have no love for their Government, and that they will enter into corrupt bargains to bring about decisions of the Court not justified under the laws and the Constitution. If I believed that to be so, most assuredly I would vote against any such proposal as that now pending; but I do not believe it, and I am in a better position to know the truth than some of my friends who disagree with me. I only ask that they possess themselves in patience until they see what happens in the event the legislation should be enacted. Let us hope that it will turn out as it did in Jackson's day, that the Court will be saved, the Nation be helped, and the Constitution be maintained without the loss of any of its force. My judgment is that will be the result.

I urge upon the lawyers most earnestly to withhold their hasty comments until they may be in possession of all the background and surrounding circumstances and facts of every nature. That is what I have tried to accomplish. I withdrew entirely from the recommendation when it was first made; I was afraid of it; but I have gone into the whole matter through many sleepless nights in an effort to satisfy myself as to the best thing for me to do to bring about the stability of our Nation, the maintenance of our institutions, and the continuance of democracy.

Another point that has been suggested is to the effect that such a recommendation, if adopted, would destroy the American system of government. Certainly it proposes to make no change in our system of government. After all, what is going to be done if the recommendation should be adopted? The Supreme Court and other Federal courts are to be treated as if they should have assistance when their judges reach the retirement age; that they may be allowed to lay down their burden if they so desire; but if they do not, and if they wish to continue, that they be not disturbed other than by an increase in the number of judges and Justices to such an extent as will enable them to discharge with expedition the important duties imposed upon them. Such a practice is not unusual. The Jewish Sanhedrin was a large body of judges, 70 or more, and, through the rules developed by experience, to the membership from time to time was added a number of young men who might sit at the feet of Gamaliel and who might acquire wisdom that would serve them well in the discharge of their duties as judges.

It has been said that the Supreme Court needs no additional Justices, and that if there should be an addition to the number of Justices it would not help the Court. Such an argument may be advanced but it must be unsound. It appears from a record, which I have before me, that in the years 1935 and 1936 the Supreme Court disposed of 1,966 cases. It is true that many of those cases were brought before the Court on a motion for writ of certiorari. The fact that the Court did not write an opinion in the cases does not mean, or, at least, it should not mean, that the record was not carefully considered. I believe that each record was considered, insofar as time and opportunity would permit. From 1880 to 1889 the average number of cases disposed of by the Court each year was 429; from 1890 to 1899 the average number of cases each year was 468; from 1900 to 1909 the average number of cases was 420; from 1910 to 1919 the average number was 570; from 1920 to 1929 the average number of cases was 761; from 1930 to 1932 the average number of cases was 898; from 1933 to 1936 the average number of cases considered each year was 983. The same number of Justices that disposed of 983 cases last year was only called upon to dispose of 429 in 1889. The number of cases disposed of has more than doubled. The number of Justices has remained the same. Undoubtedly the cases coming before the Court now are of greater importance in many respects than the cases which came before the Court 40 or 50 years ago. It appears that a fair case may be made out for an increase in the number of Justices independent of the recommendation of the President.

It must not be forgotten that Congress alone determines how many Justices there would be on the Supreme Court. While it is true that the plan of the President may not result in an increase of the membership of the Court, it would not require very much argument to convince a reasonable man that a Justice 40 years old would be capable of doing more work than one 80 years old. I believe it is the practice in many of the States—I know it has been in my own—to find some way to help the judges of the highest Court.

While I was a member of the highest court in Kentucky, it was deemed necessary by the general assembly of the State to help the court. It could not increase the number of judges, as the number is prescribed by the constitution, and the situation was such that no effort was made to secure a constitutional amendment authorizing the appointment of additional judges, but the general assembly created four commissioners, whose duty it was to consider records and State cases and make arguments within the court and prepare opinions in exactly the same manner as was done by the judges of the court. They could do everything that a judge could do except to vote. No one thought of that as being revolutionary, and, in fact, the act providing for the commissioners, as I recall, had the unanimous support of the general assembly as well as of the people of the State. In some States, such as my own, the court names the commissioners. In others, the appointive power is with the Governor. I do not believe that anyone has ever suggested that there has been an effort to pack a court by such means.

I have attempted to consider every objection that I have heard offered to the proposed legislation, in order to ascertain if there is any real basis for it. My opinion would be worth nothing, if I simply stated my opposition. My conclusion on the whole matter is that the objection made to the President's proposal is that he desires to pack the Court with those who are favorable to his political views. I do not dispute the honesty or the integrity of those making that contention but I do not believe it, and, if I took the position that I did believe it, I would be false to my own conscience and could not maintain my own self-respect. If the Government of the United States has fallen into the hands of those who have such a low concept of duty and decency, it does not make much difference what happens to it; and, if the people have lost all confidence in their public servants, as seems to be the case, then, it does not make much difference what happens.

I am answerable to myself and to my Creator for what I do here. If, following the lights I have, I cast a vote for this measure, which I believe is intended to perpetuate democracy and save the Constitution and the Court, I shall be satisfied. At this time I am satisfied.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Megill, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 62. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a free highway bridge across the Missouri River at or near Atchison, Kans.;

S. 206. An act to provide a preliminary examination and survey of the Snake River and tributaries in the States of Idaho, Washington, and Oregon, with a view to control of flood waters;

S. 1128. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to accept gifts and bequests for the benefit of the Office of Naval Records and Library, Navy Department;

S. 1130. An act to authorize the acceptance of certain lands in the city of San Diego, Calif., by the United States, and the transfer by the Secretary of the Navy of certain other lands to said city of San Diego; and

S. J. Res. 84. Joint resolution to authorize the Postmaster General to withhold the awarding of star-route contracts for a period of 60 days.

AMERICAN NEUTRALITY

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 51) to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war", approved August 31, 1935, being Public Resolution No. 67, Seventy-fourth Congress (S. J. Res. 173), as amended by joint resolution approved February 29, 1936, entitled "Joint resolution extending and amending the joint resolution (Public Res. 67, 74th Cong.), approved August 31, 1935."

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold the suggestion for a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. May I be informed as to the plan and program which is to be followed? There are two or three Members who desire to be heard for whom I must send, they now being engaged on public work, and if the Senator could advise me at this time as to the program I should be obliged to him.

Mr. ROBINSON. My understanding is that consideration of the so-called neutrality joint resolution is to be resumed. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], who was in charge of the joint resolution, is temporarily absent from the floor. I, therefore, suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ELLENDER in the chair). The absence of a quorum being suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Copeland	Lee	Pittman
Andrews	Davis	Lodge	Pope
Ashurst	Dieterich	Logan	Radcliffe
Austin	Duffy	Lonergan	Robinson
Bachman	Ellender	Lundeen	Russell
Bailey	Frazier	McAdoo	Schwartz
Barkley	George	McCarran	Schwellenbach
Black	Gerry	McGill	Sheppard
Bone	Gillette	McKellar	Smith
Borah	Green	McNary	Steiwer
Brown, Mich.	Hale	Maloney	Thomas, Okla.
Brown, N. H.	Harrison	Minton	Thomas, Utah
Bulow	Hatch	Moore	Townsend
Burke	Hayden	Murray	Tydings
Byrd	Herring	Neely	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Hitchcock	Norris	Van Nuys
Capper	Johnson, Calif.	Nye	Wagner
Caraway	Johnson, Colo.	O'Mahoney	Walsh
Chavez	King	Overton	Wheeler
Clark	La Follette	Pepper	White

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah obtained the floor.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does the Senator desire to proceed now or would he be willing to permit us to dispose of certain formal amendments which are to be presented?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, the question I believe is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]. I have talked to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations with reference to certain minor amendments. I am not going to offer any further amendments at all, but, as I have pointed out to him, it seems to me certain correcting amendments should be inserted and I am going to take the liberty of calling attention to them as I have already spoken to him about them. It matters not to me whether my remarks follow what the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee wants to do or otherwise, so I shall abide by his decision.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think it is necessary to have the Senator delay his remarks. The Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] yesterday made certain suggestions with regard to the form of language. There is only one of his suggestions which affects the amendment of the Senator from Michigan and I shall wait until after the Senator from Utah concludes his remarks. One suggestion of the Senator from Maine was that, on page 9, in line 3, there should be an amendment following the word "proclaim." The language now is that the President "shall so proclaim." The Senator from Maine suggests that following the word "proclaim" the following language should be inserted:

> And shall definitely enumerate in said proclamation the articles or materials the shipment of which the President finds it necessary, for the purposes of this section, to restrict.

However, as I said, I shall wait until the Senator from Utah has concluded.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. After making that suggestion yesterday and after having further opportunity to study the language of the joint resolution, I believe that what I had in mind is taken care of in another place in the resolution. So far as I am concerned, therefore, I am ready to withdraw the suggestion which I made as to that amendment.

Mr. PITTMAN. We can take that up after the Senator from Utah has concluded his remarks.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, in keeping with the remarks which I made in regard to amendments, I will first invite attention to those places in the joint resolution where I think the suggested amendments are quite necessary.

At the bottom of page 7, in line 25, it will be noted that older legislation and the wording of older legislation has been followed. That section, at the time the legislation was written, followed of course the ideas which were in the minds of the authors of the legislation, just as today we are following the ideas which are in our minds. The words used are "vessel or vehicle." I suggest the insertion of the word "aircraft" to make this part of the joint resolution consistent with the rest of it.

Then when one realizes that the word "vehicle" is used, one is reminded of the fact that the new measure has been written entirely in regard to those boundaries which are the seas. Therefore, in several other places, if we are to be consistent, we must make a necessary change. We must remember that in the transshipment of goods across the borders we have land boundaries as well as sea boundaries. Therefore, on page 9, in line 4, the word "vehicle" should be inserted. Also on the same page, in line 13, the word "vehicle" should be inserted.

At the top of page 10, in line 1, due to the fact that in the joint resolution the Philippines are included as being covered by the proposed legislation as a part of the United States, it would be well to add, after the words "American citizens" the words "and American nationals", to make this provision consistent with the rest of the joint resolution.

On page 10, line 9, I believe the "vehicle" idea should also be added to the idea in regard to American vessels, but probably in those places my suggestion is hardly in order.

Mr. PITTMAN. As to the Senator's suggestion that the word "vehicle" should be included in subdivision (a) of section 2, page 9, I wish to call to his attention the fact that that section does not deal with an embargo. It does not deal with anything except merchantmen of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The Senator is entirely correct. Probably in that place the amendment is not necessary. I have offered all these suggestions in a spirit of helpfulness and not in a spirit of criticism.

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly, and I very well appreciate the effect of the word "vehicle" in the other places where the provisions do not really deal exclusively with American ships.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. There may be other places which I have overlooked. I have offered these suggestions in the spirit in which I had the conversation with the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

There may be one or more other places where the same thought would apply. I think one place, for instance, will be found on page 17. These suggestions are not offered as amendments. In fact, they would probably be out of order if offered at this time.

If I may have the attention of the chairman of the committee for a moment, on page 15, in line 7, appear the words "or of a treaty to which the United States is a party." I desire to ask whether or not that sentence applies to the whole joint resolution. It specifically refers to licensing, but I assume that in practical aspect it applies to the entire measure.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is expressly provided in one sentence in the joint resolution that all the licensing provisions shall apply to the entire measure.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. That, Mr. President, completely removes any objection which might be offered to section 4, on page 12. It will be remembered that in the discussion of this section, due to the fact that the present suggested law is to cover civil strife and civil war, as well as war between states or nations, it was said that section 7 probably needed a proviso, because it might conflict with treaty agreements already made with certain Latin-American countries. With the answer which the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee has made, there is no conflict here; and, as I see the matter, there is no need for a proviso.

Mr. President, I am entirely out of harmony with the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]. I believe that taking out of the joint resolution the provisions which he seeks to strike out would destroy the effectiveness of the measure. It may be well for us, for a moment or two, to pause and consider the way in which our neutrality legislation came into existence. It may be proper for us to stop and realize that so far as the Neutrality Act of 1935 and the Neutrality Act of 1936 are concerned, both were temporary acts. We are now dealing with permanent legislation. Our attitude toward the measure, therefore, should be different. We are definitely laying down a policy which will direct the United States in other laws and in other attitudes as they are related to this proposed law, which will become more or less fundamental.

If I understand correctly, I think I realize why the Senator from Michigan offers his amendment. I think, if I have not drawn the wrong deduction, he offers it primarily because of the wide discretionary power which is left in the hands of the President. I think the deduction which the Senator has made, if I am properly interpreting him, is an improper one; that the reasoning which was used is erroneous; and that the conclusion which he drew, especially when he quoted from John Bassett Moore, is a conclusion which will not and cannot hold.

Under the joint resolution as it stands, if the whole spirit of the resolution is governed by the first section, there never can be a partial treatment of belligerents or factions. It would be outside of ordinary reason and ordinary logic to assume that the President could use his discretion for one side or another side of a given controversy. It is entirely beside the point, if we accept what has been written by the great John Bassett Moore and some of his followers as conclusive, that under these provisions the President actually has the right and the power to bring about war without an act of Congress.

The logic of such an assertion falls when we carry through the logic in regard to mandatory and discretionary powers. If, under a discretion, the President has the right to choose one belligerent in contradistinction to another, or to frame his proclamation so that it will act in favor of one faction in contradistinction to another, if he can do that by his discretion, then if we make his action mandatory, and if his discretionary action will make it possible for the President to lead us into a war or put us into a war, our mandatory words will actually put us there, regardless of anything the President may do because he has to act in regard to a proclamation.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Before the Senator leaves the reference to John Bassett Moore, I am not quite clear as to what the Senator intended to say. Is he saying that I misapplied John Bassett Moore's warning, or that John Bassett Moore himself is mistaken?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I should not say that the Senator misapplied it; that is certain. I did not mean that if I said it. I think the deduction which John Bassett Moore has made is a deduction which does not hold.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In other words, the Senator is quarreling with John Bassett Moore fundamentally?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am; and I think my logic will follow in that direction.

There is nothing in this joint resolution, as far as the resolution itself is concerned, which transfers to the President power that he does not already have to make war or to get us into war. Everyone knows that discretion is inherent in the Executive, and that no neutrality act, no matter how mandatory it might be, could affect conditions brought about by the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, as a negotiator with foreign countries, as the representative of our Government in all international affairs, and as the executor of our laws.

It is not a matter of discretion in the President, but there is an actual condition which makes it perfectly possible for the President at any time to get us into a situation which might make for war. There is always inherent in his position a possibility of his getting us into a situation which may make for peace. A neutrality measure of this kind would in no way change a situation of that kind. It could not change it. We could not take away those powers which under the Constitution are inherent in the office itself by a measure of this kind, or by making a certain thing mandatory. We could not remove from the President those powers which are his from the mere fact that he holds the office that he does hold.

As for assuming that if we have a mandatory provision making the President do certain things instead of a discretionary provision, I repeat that a discretion is there for him to do something. If he has a mandate, he practically has to do it. So, on the score of making war, mandatory ideas are very much weaker in the practical aspect of the case than are discretionary ideas so far as controlling the President is concerned.

If I had my way with regard to this proposed law—and I have not—it is in the first section that I would stress the actual need for discretionary power on the part of the President; and it is in making this section mandatory that we are weakening the law, if the law is brought into existence with one purpose or with one of its many purposes that of keeping us out of war or preventing war.

In the first place, a mandate is actually weaker than discretion, because with a mandate the President must await eventualities and events before he can act. With discretion, broadly accepted, the President may act in accordance with circumstances as they arise. It may be said that this is too great a power for the Executive, but he has it inherently in his position, and it is better to let him have it here, first of all, because we do not know anything about the next war. For example, a war between France and Siam would be a war affecting us quite differently from a war between Great Britain and France. Yet the rule is made so binding that the President has to act in exactly the same way in each case. A civil strife which takes on the proportions of a civil war in a very insignificant country is a thing quite different from a world war. Yet under the proposed law we would make the President issue the same proclamation and bring about the same sort of a declaration in either case. Thus it will be seen that the mandatory notion is actually, in practice, a weaker idea than the discretionary one, and in effectiveness very much weaker.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am glad to yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am very much interested in the Senator's statement, because from my viewpoint I find so astounding the statement, to wit, that the mandatory section is weaker in its protection than a discretionary section.

Let me ask the Senator this question: Suppose we eliminated the mandate entirely and relied exclusively upon discretion, which I understand to be the Senator's preference, would not the President then be free to join America to a program, for example, of League of Nations sanctions, if he saw fit?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Of course not. The sanctions idea is in no sense an idea based upon the theory of impartial neutrality. It is just as far away from that theory as the poles are from each other. The whole theory of the League of Nations sanctions idea—and we ought to explain what the League of Nations sanctions idea is, since the Senator brought the subject up—is based upon the notion of the destruction of the neutral theory, especially the impartial notion of neutrality.

If the League of Nations should put into force a sanction, neutrality would go out of the window, and as long as we had this neutrality theory and this neutrality act, the President could not cooperate directly with the sanctions idea, because he would be prevented by our laws from doing it. He could do what is being done now, and, as the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee pointed out when he said that certain European states are now following our embargo practice, our neutrality act could become a stronger embargo as it actually was than could the sanction, as far as embargoes are concerned. Then, if the sanction follows the theory and the practice of our neutrality embargo, of course, there is harmony between the objectives which the United States has and the objectives which the League has.

That is proved by the way which the Senator from Nevada suggested yesterday, through agreement of European nations in regard to nonintervention, or their idea of neutrality, which was an agreement in keeping with our embargo act in regard to Spain. There would be harmony, but there would be no formal way, under our conditions, of ever having the President, under the proposed law, act in conformity with the sanction idea, because we are not a party to the bringing of the sanctions into being.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Of course I fully realize that so long as we have a neutrality statute requiring the impartial administration of any restriction under it there could be no collaboration with respect to sanctions. The thing about which I was asking the Senator is unrelated to the existing law but related to the abstract proposition which I understood him to submit, that Executive discretion without limitation was the desirable process. I was asking him whether, if he could have his way, it would produce unlimited Executive discretion that could not produce our cooperation with sanctions of the League of Nations.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Not as long as we adhere to the neutral theory back of our embargo.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I quite understand that, but I am trying to discover the Senator's view of a preferable formula, which, as I understand him, would be complete Executive discretion.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Not as long as we have our present law, not as long as we adhere to the neutral theory. If the Senator from Michigan will think back he will remember that one of the amendments which I suggested was an amendment which would make it absolutely certain that the idea of impartiality is the one which the President must follow as long as we adhere to the neutral policy.

As far as the League of Nations sanctions are concerned, they are not related in any way to any embargo which has to do with the neutral theory. I have to repeat that, because our minds are running in different directions. It is from the part of the joint resolution of which the Senator from Michigan is suggesting a modification that John Bassett Moore draws his conclusions. His conclusions, I think, are not well grounded, because he starts with the premise that someone may wish to use his discretionary power to cooperate with the League or some other organization in the punishment of an aggressor. Until we make a declaration that that should be our aim, indirectly we have accepted the theory, in the pact with the Argentine, but as long as we adhere to the policy of neutrality, it seems to me that, as far as our American law is concerned, the way in which it is worded here, we have to adhere to the idea of impartiality.

This does not mean that under the international law theory of impartiality, a nation can be partial or can be impartial, as it sees fit. But we are talking about domestic law and the policy which the United States has enacted to govern her when there may be war in the world. Have I helped to clarify the matter?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I greatly appreciate the Senator's exposition. I think I failed to make my inquiry clear. In my inquiry of the Senator I was abandoning all consideration of the pending proposal. I was seeking to discover the extent to which he would be willing to go in his assertion that Executive discretion was desirable and safe, and I was trying to find whether he would go to the extent of giving the Executive an unlimited discretion even to be partial, and even then to the extent of associating ourselves, at least in cooperation, with a sanction program of the League of Nations. I was merely trying to bring the Senator's objective to its conclusion, so that I could more fully understand him.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I can answer the question in this way: I should like to see the American Government a member of the League of Nations, but I should not like to see the American Government a member of the League of Nations under the present conditions of thought in the United States, because it would be a membership which would utterly fail. The League of Nations' fundamental concept rests, first of all, upon the peaceful process; and, second, the democratic one. If the people of the United States are not actually anxious to agree with the fundamental principles of the covenant, it would be a political mistake and a political blunder for the United States to join the League. So long as the sentiment of the people of the country is as it is, I should not favor membership. Have I made myself plain?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I should like such a feeling that we could cooperate to the fullest extent with the League, but the sentiment is not here, we are far from it, and the very fact that this neutrality act has become attractive throughout the country shows that that is far from the sentiment of our people. If in the course of time we can educate the people so that they will see aright, then, of course, the situation will be quite different. But if we ever associate with the League it should be after open discussion and formal action in complete accord with our Constitution.

In answer to the Senator from Michigan, I do not believe that any branch of government or any kind of government should ever attempt to do anything contrary to the wishes of its people. Therefore the suggestion that the President might use the power proposed to be given him here to do something which he should not do is a suggestion which, I think, is more or less a reflection upon the kind of President we might have; and I do not mean that in a personal way.

I shall now repeat: If the joint resolution were written as I think a permanent bill should be written, there should be wide discretionary power left with the President, because he is going to have it anyway, and because no one can tell what kind of war we are going to have, or where civil strife is going to break forth. But in this connection, in order that the President should be curbed, and should be properly advised, and so that there should be unity between the Congress, which has the war-declaring power, and the Executive, my original plan—and it was adopted by the Senate of the United States, but was thrown out in conference—was to add to the council which directs the trade in munitions the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate and the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House, and this munitions council would thereby become informally and actually an advisory council to govern or to suggest to the President or at least be available for the purpose of advising the President of the situation as it actually existed in relation to his proclamations in regard to neutrality or in regard to embargo.

Thus it is seen the theory will become not an absolute strait jacket—and I hate to use that word, because it is so improperly used in regard to everything—but it would result, like most good things in government, in the establishment of an institution which could contribute usefully at a given time or in a given situation.

Take, for example, the strength of the mandatory act: We saw what happened last summer. The President had not the power, according to the strict interpretation of the wording of our act, to put an embargo on the shipment of goods to Spain, because the act did not cover civil war. The weakness of the mandatory provision was shown right there. It was necessary for us to enact a mandatory embargo covering a particular country. If what the newspapers said is true, the President, or that branch of the Government which administered the measure, had used persuasive powers and found them of no avail; so the theory of the people and the feeling of the people and the feeling of the Government itself was that this law should be extended to cover civil war. We know by the passage of the Arms Embargo Act of 1935 (the Arms Embargo Act was first recommended, I believe, as early as 1925. I think we acted on it in 1935. I care not which date you use) that the theory of the people supported this course, yet because of the mandatory provision it was impossible for the President to act.

That condition may occur at any time. Therefore, if this permanent law provided for a strong discretionary power and an advisory council, it would, of course, be a very much more effective and a very much better permanent law.

Before we leave this section I wish to say, in spite of the fact that I have already mentioned this matter to some of the Members of the Senate, that if we were rewriting the joint resolution, I should surely take out the phrase "the state of war" and the phrase "civil strife"; I should substitute for the first the simple word "war", and for the phrase "civil strife" I should substitute the words "civil war or insurrection." The reason for such suggestion I am sure is apparent to all. No matter what anyone says, there is a difference between the phrase "a state of war" and the word "war." That difference, legally and actually, is shown from the fact that legally, as far as the United State and Germany and Austria were concerned, we had a state of war with those countries until the middle of 1921, although actually war with those countries ended with the armistice. A condition may arise at almost any time in Europe, through a declaration or through uncertainty in internal government and the relationship between governments, which would make it almost necessary for all governments to describe that condition as "a state of war", and yet there may be no war. There have been periods in the history of the world, and Senators all know them, though a condition of a state of war existed over a great number of years, though there were no battles, when there was no actual warfare, though there was even actual communication between the countries as in peace time.

In regard to civil strife, if we assume and expand and take those words to mean what they ordinarily do, when governments make changes not by orderly elections but by a coup d'état, for example, or by that which is termed civil strife without warfare, the necessity comes upon the President to issue such a proclamation as provided for in the measure, if he is consistent. It is true that other sections of the joint resolution make this argument not quite so valid as it might be; but I leave those ideas for what they are worth, and I make the suggestion merely in the spirit and in keeping with the fact that we are adopting permanent legislation.

There is no doubt in my mind that the primary purpose of the proposed legislation is not to curb trade, but to keep us out of war, and to keep American citizens from gaining profit from war. If the civil controversy is a peaceful process, why should we resort to a proclamation of this kind, and interfere with the ordinary trade of our country? If the state of war is not actual warfare, but merely a technical state of war such as we had from the time of the armistice to the middle of 1921, why should we make it necessary for the President to issue such a proclamation under those circumstances? It seems to me that the resolution can be greatly strengthened by those two simple suggestions, and it will thereby become very much clearer.

While I am on my feet I should like to say that I agree to the utmost with the remarks which the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] made yesterday in regard to paragraph (b), the cash-and-carry section of the resolution. The cash-and-carry idea is new. It is entirely experimental. We can only make conjectures about its effect. The first time I knew of the idea was when I read a magazine article in Current History for June 1936. The author of that article has a similar article in the Atlantic Monthly for this month. There he emphasizes the fact that the cash-and-carry basis may be an effective means of enabling us to dodge our responsibility. That is logic which we cannot deny. There is no doubt that certain responsibilities are dodged, or at least are not assumed. All that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] suggests today in regard to this matter is true if we merely add the words that this is an experiment, and we cannot project the consequence. I believe that the consequence will be exactly as the senior Senator from Idaho pointed out yesterday. Excepting upon a purely experimental basis, I believe it would be very unwise to put anything like this into permanent legislation. It may not bring war to our back yards or our front doors under every circumstance, but everyone knows that it cannot help but bring actual hostilities, actual warfare, nearer to us than if we did not enact such a provision.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am very much interested in the reasoning of the Senator with regard to the provision of the resolution which he is now discussing. I still cannot see what difference it makes as to the character of the goods or the effect of the goods or the actual transportation of the goods whether the title is in citizens of the United States or the title is in someone else at the time they are attempted to be exported.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. While, of course, there is no change, and all the Senator says is true, let us assume that an agency of a government at war is set up in one of our ports in anticipation of or as a result of this proposed act, and that agency builds up its credit and transfers goods produced on American soil, the fact that even before the goods are put on a ship the transfer is known merely means that an enemy vessel which is interested in those goods is, of course, going to be on the alert very much earlier than it might otherwise have been.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator suggests that the enemy vessel would be more alert. It was known to Germany during the last war that goods were moving from our ports as rapidly as ships could take them; I think that is true, and I think that Germany knew that there were five or six or seven times more British ships carrying those goods than there were American ships carrying them. Furthermore, French ships and ships of various other nations were carrying them. Germany knew that they were going to Great Britain or France or to her other enemies, and, therefore, she had just as much incentive to stop those goods as she would have under this proposed act. I cannot see why the hazard to our peace would be as great.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. That, too, is very true, Mr. President, I agree with what the Senator has said; but the cruising range of submarines is very different in 1937 from what it was in 1914 or 1915, although one submarine did get over here. However, due to the increased cruising range, the military tactics of defense and offense are going to be different. In the particular case mentioned it was to the advantage of Germany, of course, acting on the defensive, so far as sea warfare was concerned, to concentrate her energies—where? Around the homeland, around her own waters, where she could be both a defensive factor in the war and also an offensive one so far as the destruction of commerce was concerned.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Yes.

Mr. GERRY. Does not the Senator think that when the Allies started the convoy system, after the United States entered the war, the submarine picture changed? As soon as Great Britain began to convoy merchant vessels the submarines began to be less effective as far as the number of vessels they were able to sink was concerned. That was the result of the convoy system, as it was the result of the convoy system in the time of Napoleon.

When that happened and when after our entry into the war we were able to put so many more destroyers at the disposal of our allies the German submarines operating in the blockaded area suffered. More submarines were lost, and they found it increasingly difficult to operate against the convoy.

As the Senator knows, we carried 2,000,000 men to Europe, and not one man was lost on a vessel that was convoyed by the American Navy. The result, naturally, was that the nation that was suffering most from the blockade tried, as France did in the Napoleonic wars, to make the most use of commerce destroyers, and went further afield to attack the enemy's commerce or to hold up neutral commerce which was aiding her enemy nations, That is the situation that really existed before the end of the World War. As soon as we came into the war the British started in earnest the convoy system. Then, of course, the submarines, with their large cruising radius—and even at that time the German submarines had a cruising radius of between 4,000 and 5,000 miles, mounted 6-inch guns, and were able to do 22 knots—were very formidable and able to go into the far lanes of commerce. They came to our own coast even before we got into the war. A submarine came into the waters of my State, ran into Newport, and then went to sea again. My view is that the more acutely a country is suffering from a blockade the more apt it is to embark upon submarine warfare and employ commerce destroyers, and that is what finally involves neutrals and brings neutrals into the war.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. That merely illustrates, I think, the point which I am trying to make, that we are dealing with the unknown in regard to this great change. I repeat what I said, that we do not know whether this is going to bring the theater of war closer to us or not, but we can——

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I do not wish to interrupt the Senator unduly, but does he not think that the history of the World War proves to a large extent that the circumstances I have indicated make for more commerce destroyers?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Of course, and I think also——

Mr. GERRY. I do not think that condition is unknown; I think it is history. I disagree with the Senator that it is unknown. That is the point I am trying to make.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I will accept it as a naval idea; but I am sure, so far as the effect of this particular suggestion in the joint resolution is concerned, that those conditions are unknown because we have not tried this sort of policy. Whether it will draw the war to us or not remains to be seen, but it adds another stimulus to bring it nearer.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Utah another question?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator, who is quite familiar with the history of the last war, will remember that, beginning in 1917, the German Government established a war zone in the open sea 20 or 30 miles away from the shore entirely surrounding the belligerents, Great Britain, France, and Italy, and the eastern Mediterranean, and that Germany announced to the world that she would sink every ship that came within that zone, neutral ships as well as belligerent ships. Would it not be better in that kind of case, both for our citizens and the peace of the country, that our American seamen should not be killed in that zone and that American property should not be destroyed in that zone?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Of course it would be. I am in agreement with the conclusion which the Senator has made when he places that picture before me. But in that particular case the zone which the German Government set up was a defensive zone, and, being a defensive zone, it was necessary for Germany to keep her vessels there for action. The picture would be quite different if there were no zone placed there, and the tactics were different in the light of the progress, if it may be called progress, which has been made in naval warfare.

Mr. PITTMAN. If there were such a zone, and the submarines were pursuing the same practice, would it not relieve our Government of the insistence of its citizens for redress by reason of the destruction of our commerce in that zone which we declared to be illegal?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Certainly; it would. That part of the idea is a perfectly valid one, accepted on its primary premise.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then the purpose of compelling the conveyance of the title of American products to some foreigner before they get in that zone, to that extent, is a good idea, is it not?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. It is a good idea to the extent that we relieve ourselves, as I have admitted, of responsibility. However, the point I am mentioning is entirely different from that, as I am sure the Senator knows. I am not even saying that the notion which the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] advanced yesterday has been proved, or that it can be proved until we have a given war with a given set of circumstances to demonstrate whether this joint resolution would bring war nearer to our own waters. But I am assuming that it would, and it is that contention and only that contention which I am arguing.

Mr. PITTMAN. Very well. I had taken up the discussion with the Senator as to whether or not it is a good idea to have our goods destroyed in those zones, and to that extent we agree.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I do not think it is a good idea to have our goods destroyed anywhere.

Mr. PITTMAN. Therefore if we can get paid for them before somebody else destroys them, so much the better.

As to the question of bringing war nearer our shores, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] largely bases that argument upon the greater cruising radius of submarines. Let us assume that they have a greater cruising radius and therefore can work nearer to our coast, which is 3,000 miles away from their base, than they have ever been able to do. We know what the merchant ships of the world are. We know that Great Britain had more merchant ships than any other country in the world, and probably has more now. We know she had the largest navy in the world except ours. She had control of the seas so far as the last war was concerned. She kept commerce and trade from getting to Germany. The same incentive would be found to destroy cargoes if we should have the same kind of war. Whether we have this provision in the joint resolution or not, British ships would be carrying most of the trade and her enemy would be after the same kind of ships, if we assume the same kind of a war. If it be better to destroy those ships at our door rather than as was done before, if it be better military strategy to stop those ships two or three thousand miles away from Europe than where they were stopped during the previous war, then Great Britain's enemy will stop them and search them near our shores to determine whether or not they are carrying contraband. It is contraband that they want to stop. Contraband is contraband no matter who owns it.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Not necessarily, but that which they have declared to be contraband.

Mr. PITTMAN. I shall not go into an argument as to what constitutes contraband, because contraband, so far as the belligerent submarine is concerned, or the belligerent war vessel is concerned, is what it says is contraband. The real object is to stop whatever it can from getting to the enemy. They will stop it at the point where they can best stop it.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Not necessarily.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think they would, but perhaps the Senator may differ with me about it.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Of course, there are many factors involved. Just as there are differing wars, so there may be many kinds of factors involved. A gunboat may be doing two duties at the same time, and under those circumstances it would act consistently with the particular military tactics involved.

Mr. PITTMAN. They would undoubtedly stop the goods where they thought was the most strategic point.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I think not. The destruction of the goods is their aim. I would not admit the Senator's point.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then I do not understand the Senator's contention at all. I thought I did, but apparently I do not understand the point he is endeavoring to make.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. GERRY. I am afraid I misunderstood the Senator from Utah. I understand him to say now that he feels that the pending joint resolution would be liable to bring the war closer to our shores. Am I correct in that understanding?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. That is correct.

Mr. GERRY. I agree heartily with the Senator's statement in that respect. I misunderstood him. The situation is this: Suppose Great Britain is in a war, with her preponderance of control of the seas, or suppose Japan should be at war, with naval preponderance over her enemy in the Pacific. Then what they would do, if their ships were sunk in numbers by submarines off our shores, would probably be to convoy, if possible, from our ports, so as to protect their shipments from attack, unless they were carrying their goods on very fast ships like a liner. Of course, the Senator knows that even the fastest submarine has little chance of destroying a fast vessel. The Lusitania was destroyed when she slowed down.

When a ship is going over 25 knots an hour, of course, a submarine is not effective. A submarine cannot make more than 8 knots submerged. But what an enemy submarine would do, which would be effective in the way of a blockade, would probably be to start the attack upon the weak neutrals carrying goods from our shores, and then we would have the situation to which I referred yesterday. We would have the submarines operating right off our own coast. I agree with the Senator entirely on that point. The submarine is able to operate off our own coast not only because of its cruising radius, but because it can submerge and hide.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I know the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] is a wonderful expert on naval matters and is very much in favor of a large Navy. I, too, favor a large Navy. I believe in "playing both ends against the middle"—to do everything we can to keep out of war, and then be in a position to win the war if it is forced upon us.

I agree that the submarines have a larger cruising radius than they ever had. Whether it would be strategy on their part to try to destroy contraband, which means all products nowadays, intended for their enemies, by acting along our coast or at strategic points on the other side of the ocean, I do not know and probably no one else knows. On the other hand, we do know as a common-sense proposition that they are going to stop everything they can that is intended for their enemy, and they are going to call it contraband, which means goods intended for their enemy, no matter what we call them. They are not interested in the title to the goods. They do not care whether the goods are owned by John Smith or by John Brown or by anyone else. They do not intend to have those goods reach their enemy. Therefore they will destroy them on this side of the Atlantic or the other side, or this side of the Pacific or the other side, and the only difference will be that our citizens will not be the suckers in the next war that they were in the last war, but will get their money in advance. Then every time a shipload of cargo is sunk somewhere, they will not be running to our Government and claiming it was an illegal sinking, that it was not contraband of war, and that there was no right to sink it.

Free ships mean free cargo with the exception of contraband, but what is contraband will be a cause of incitement in the minds of our people if any cargoes are sunk. I cannot possibly see where the question of title has anything to do with the destroying of goods, or whether they may be destroyed here or there or elsewhere.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield further?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. GERRY. Does not the Senator think that where we find enemy submarines exercising the right—and this is something, as I said before, that has been bothering me in connection with the proposed legislation—of operating off our shores, we are liable to get into the difficulty about which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] spoke yesterday, and in regard to which I think he is entirely correct? He said it would be very difficult for a submarine to determine what was neutral shipping and what was enemy shipping, and this, of course, makes more difficult and more obnoxious the matter of visit and search.

For example, it is not merely a question of the 3-mile limit. A ship engaged in our coastwise traffic, of course, does not hug the shore for within 3 miles. If it is going to Puerto Rico, it is going out to sea. If it is going from San Francisco to Honolulu, it is going far out to sea. What I fear is that we shall now be practically saying that in time of war we have no interest in blockades; we have no interest in protecting our shipping. This joint resolution practically says that we do not care what happens to our shipping, provided we do not get into a war. The resultant difficulty may be that we shall be troubled with drastic visit and search on our coastwise shipping and have a situation near enough so that it will make for more ill feeling and more danger of war than if we stuck to the old rules.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The Senator, I think, has made my point better than I myself could have made it had I been allowed to go on.

We are dealing with an unknown. This sort of think has not been attempted before. We are dealing with an unknown so far as the attempt to embargo or to transfer goods is concerned. We are dealing with an unknown so far as the changed ideas in regard to contraband are concerned. We are dealing with an unknown in regard to the rights of neutrals at sea, or even the rights of belligerents at sea. We are dealing with an unknown in regard to the progress which is being made in warfare itself. We are dealing with an unknown in regard to the various factors which will enter into the type of war we are going to have. We are dealing with an absolutely unknown in regard to one great arm of naval warfare now known as the airplane carrier, and the type of naval tactics it will carry on. Only once in the history of the world has an airplane carrier been used in actual warfare, and in that case it was used in a way that was completely out of harmony with any sort of standard that has ever been laid down for the proper conduct of belligerents in time of war.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Certainly.

Mr. PITTMAN. There are a great many things that are, as the Senator says, uncertain and unknown. It is not now known what will constitute what is called contraband of war in the next war. It never has been definitely known in time of war, and it probably never will be. In fact, it is almost impossible to agree on the definition of contraband in time of peace, and we may be sure that in time of war we shall not know what it is. That unknown quantity is one of our dangers, because we contend that one thing is contraband, while the belligerents contend that another is contraband. They think they are legally confiscating our goods. We think they are illegally confiscating our goods. That is an unknown factor. It is also unknown where the belligerents will fight.

There are, however, certain things that are known. One of them is that the belligerents will attempt to prevent goods of all characters and kinds from going to the enemy, and that under international law they have the right of visit, search, and seizure if they preserve life while they are doing it. That is a known fact. Another known fact is that according to our concepts of law our goods were illegally confiscated and illegally destroyed by all the belligerent governments in the late war, and that that illegality aroused the passions of the people of this country to such a point that they demanded war. That is one thing we know.

The other things we do not know; but those which we do know are sufficient to make us avoid them.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Regarding the unknown, the Senator has said in very beautiful language that which I tried to say in my crude way. What he has said about the known, it seems to me, proves beyond any doubt whatever that with the transfer of goods known, and with their ownership known, and with our responsibility completely dodged, at least one factor is removed; and that factor is that there may be a doubt in the mind of any belligerent as to what it should do in regard to those goods, because the ownership probably would be unknown, or at least the ownership would still remain in the hands of a neutral.

If we pass ownership, as is suggested, we give that ownership to a belligerent, and we give it to him in our own front yard. If that is not inviting the theater of war right over to our front yard, I cannot conceive of anything else that would do it.

Mr. PITTMAN. If it was easy for Germany to stop the shipment of commodities off the coast of Ireland because her submarines could be concentrated closer to the enemy, closer to her own bases, closer to her ammunition, closer to her points of repair, would it not still be so, no matter who owned the goods?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Not necessarily. As has been said before, the problem is quite different. We do not know what will happen; and that is my point about this whole neutrality measure. Everyone assumes that the next war is going to be exactly like the last one; that Germany is going to fight the great naval powers; and that the Allies are going to be divided in much the same way as before, and that zones will be established in much the same way, and that of necessity defenses will be thrown up in the same way. I do not accept that conclusion. There may be any kind of war. As I suggested at the beginning of my remarks, a war between Siam and France is one thing, and a world war is another; and yet the provisions of this measure would act upon both conflicts in exactly the same way.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Certainly.

Mr. PITTMAN. In the first place, any preparation in the nature of restraint against a particular government after war commences is, of course, looked upon as unneutral according to international law. I do not wish to discuss neutrality because I am not capable of adequately doing so. It is conceived by belligerents as one thing and by neutrals as another; but I think it is our duty to prepare for another world war. If there is a war between two little countries, we shall not be bothered. As a matter of fact, when Japan had her war with Russia, we were not bothered about contraband. Why? Because the great navies of Great Britain and the United States were so powerful that Japan could not lay down a declaration of contraband that we did not like.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. If we were not bothered then, why should we make it necessary to put in force a proclamation of this kind?

Mr. PITTMAN. Because I say we are not bothered by any little war; but if we are not going to blind ourselves we shall be prepared this time for a world war, when the last time we were not prepared for the World War.

When the World War came on, we had no provision of law by which we could prevent our citizens from traveling on belligerent vessels; and 128 of them were killed on the Lusitania off the coast of Ireland. Do we wish to prepare against that now, or do we wish to wait?

Of course the Senator from Utah will say that we wish to prepare against it. Our ships were sunk without notice, and without distinction between them and the ships of belligerent nations, because the Germans contended that the belligerent merchant ships were armed and that they used our flag to decoy the German submarines alongside, where they could be sunk with one shot. When we appealed to the belligerents to disarm their ships they would not do it; and then Germany sank all ships alike.

We shall have to prepare against that now. Instead of making the mistake we made in the last war of arming our merchant ships, when the arms on board of them were like a cap pistol as a defense against submarines. So far as we know, not a submarine was ever destroyed by a merchant ship, certainly up to the time we went into the war. We put on our merchant ships arms that constituted a threat but were not a defense, and we thereby invited destruction.

I know that the Senator wishes to prepare against that happening again; and I say to him now that he knows our only safety is to act so far as possible in a peaceable manner and prepare for peace instead of for war. If we wish to send our ships into a war zone let us send our naval vessels along with them and not send our poor seamen to destruction.

The Senator says we are not thinking of another world war. The Senator, great historian that he is, knows that today all the major countries of Europe and part of Asia are arming more seriously, more intensely for war than ever before in the history of the world. Why do you suppose these great governments are straining every resource they have, threatening the bankruptcy of their people, building up their armaments higher and higher and higher, unless they expect war? If they expect war, they know the reasons that cause them to expect it; and we know that if there is a war in which legislation of this kind is necessary to protect us, that war will involve all of Europe, and the major part of Asia. So we need not blind ourselves by stating that we do not know what is going to happen.

If nothing happens, we shall not need legislation of this kind. If that happens which we have a right to believe will happen, we should not sit silently by and refuse to do anything merely because we do not know all that is going to happen.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. After having painted that picture, of course, the Senator will agree with me that if my contention is correct that this measure would draw the war into our own territorial waters, probably it would be very, very unwise legislation.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator has been discussing subparagraph (b) of section 2. That subparagraph makes it unlawful to export or to ship any of the commodities that are banned by section 1 of the joint resolution, as well as those banned by section 2. In other words, it makes unlawful the exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war; but it also provides that title to these prohibited articles must pass here in the United States.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. All articles.

Mr. WHITE. All articles, the prohibited articles, as well as the articles which are provisionally prohibited.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Any article.

Mr. WHITE. What troubles me is this: If shipment of an article is prohibited by section 1, why should we legalize the sale and delivery of that article here within the United States, that being the very first step in the transportation of the article? I just cannot see why we should permit that. If we are going to forbid the exportation and transportation of it, why should we permit the sale of it, and the payment for it here in the United States, and the delivery of it to the agent of the belligerent country? To me that is the initial step in the transportation which we are proposing to prohibit. Will the Senator comment on that?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The only way in which one can comment on that is in keeping with the type of picture I have been trying to paint about uncertainties. It seems to me that if we make the exportation of an article absolutely illegal but provide for a peaceful and legal transfer of that article when we know exactly what it is to be used for, we are more than ever inviting an interested belligerent to be more on its guard than ever, and probably go to the extremes that were gone to here during the World War, of actually destroying some of our industrial plants in order to make that sort of thing ineffective.

If, for example, an industrial plant in a neutral country is actually owned by a belligerent, that presents a complication in the international law of war that is so difficult that I could not discuss it this afternoon. But by this act we have at least made it possible to discuss that question in more than an academic way, as the Senator from Maine has pointed out. We are dealing with so many unknown factors that it seems to me beyond question of any kind of doubt at all that paragraph (b) does invite the theater of war into our own neighborhood.

The first duty of all neutral States—and by "neutral States" I do not refer to an international law concept, but I mean all those States which are not in war—is to isolate every war just as much as they can. That is a moral obligation, that is an aim of common sense. It is in the interest of ordinary trade to keep this disease which we call war in just as small a section of the world as possible.

If, in our attempt to avoid war, if in our attempt to keep us out of war, we resort to a strictly legal process which in law is proper—I will not question its morals, its ethics, or anything of that kind—we do bring on a situation which makes it harder to isolate war, and we do invite every sort of enemy interest, whether it is a naval interest, or whether it is submarines, whether it is airplane carriers, whether it is a spy interest, into our own backyard, and, what is more, we lay down a proposition which makes it necessary for them to plan for this very thing.

The Senator from Nevada painted a picture about the arming of the world. I have read many times that one of the reasons for the arming is this neutrality act itself. I do not accept that statement, but I do know that if we enact the proposed legislation and if it does attract to our waters belligerent vessels of various kinds, or belligerents of any kind, we have extended the theater of war so close to us that there is a necessity for more armaments, and the need for using the armaments is more apparent. With those two propositions we bring the chances of war right into our neighborhood very much more certainly than without an idea of this kind.

Mr. President, that is my point, and this is why I have pointed out this one fact, to come back to what I was about to say. This cash-and-carry idea was thrust upon the world, I am pretty sure, by a man who had had wide war experiences, a man who in his articles was trying to point out the inconsistencies of our neutral policy as proposed in 1935, and continued in 1936; a man who tells us in each of his articles that instead of this neutrality measure being an act to keep us out of war it is an act which, perhaps, will get us into war. Then he offers one simple suggestion, and that suggestion has been taken up—a suggestion which is no older than a year or a year and a half at most—and that suggestion is going to be written into the permanent law of our land and be a permanent neutral policy.

I repeat it may be wise, it may result as the Senator from Nevada says it will, but, on the other hand, it may result as the Senator from Idaho says it will, and we may have a war in our own front yard or in our own back yard. It is for that reason I make this point here.

There is an element of tremendous responsibility resting on us today which we did not have to meet a year ago, and which we did not have present 2 years ago. We knew that the act of 1935 was a temporary act. We were willing to experiment with the idea. We knew from the history of wars and from the history of the concept of neutrality that probably we had pounced upon an idea which was the poorest of all ideas to pounce upon to keep us out of war. But due to the spirit of the people of our country, due to the feeling that something must be done, due to what was an impending catastrophe in Europe, and due to a number of other factors, we knew we should say something, and we did say something. That was right and that was proper, and no one wants to delay in any sense the tremendous development of the antiwar feeling which got started in our country.

In the whole history of the United States there has never been expressed a nobler or a finer sentiment in regard to war or a more splendid attitude toward war than was expressed by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] on the floor of the Senate when he declared that we want no war and that we want no wealth gained from war. I say that that declaration is the very peak of all of the peace pronouncements ever made in the history of our country, and in keeping with that declaration, and in keeping with the spirit which brought it forth, the two emergency acts, as we may call them, or at least the temporary acts, became laws of limited duration.

We are now about to pass a permanent act, and in that permanent act we are providing for an experiment which has never been tried. We are putting into it an idea that is not 2 years old. We are including a notion about which no one knows anything, and there does not now exist the desire we had in 1935, a feeling that we must do this for the sake of keeping us out of war. In fact, that is being questioned by more than one person today. So that, if we consider the seriousness of permanent legislation, I do not believe my remarks have been out of place, and I do hope they have been helpful. The suggestions which I have made have not been brought forward as formal amendments at all, not only because amendments would have been out of order at this time, but because I think there should be the widest scope of thoughtfulness about these ideas, and especially the ideas which are so new not only to us, but new to the whole world. If, for example, our neutral policy is going to make it necessary for nations who are dependent upon us to build up investments here, to cause their financial resources to be deposited here in anticipation of something that is going to happen, and if the transfer of goods goes to the extreme, as has been suggested by the Senator from Maine, how can we dodge, no matter how we try, the responsibility that rests upon our shoulders when you realize that the thing which we are trying to avoid, which we are trying to put away from us, we are inviting into our own territorial waters.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I have been discussing a tentative program with the majority leader and with the minority leader, who have discussed it with other Senators; and, if we can have an understanding with regard to the debate tomorrow, I think it would be agreeable to the Senate to take a recess at this time until tomorrow. I am about to make a request for unanimous consent, and if any Senator has a suggestion or change to make I ask that he make it now.

I ask unanimous consent that commencing tomorrow at the hour of 1 o'clock, debate on the pending joint resolution (S. J. Res. 51) be limited to 30 minutes, and that debate on any amendment pending or proposed to the joint resolution be limited to 15 minutes until final action is taken on the joint resolution.

Is such a proposal satisfactory?

Mr. McNARY. Yes; with the further provision that no Senator shall speak more than once.

Mr. PITTMAN. And that no Senator shall speak more than once on the joint resolution, or on any amendment thereto. I understand that the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] will be ready to address the Senate tomorrow; will he not?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator will not be limited as to time until 1 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent proffered by the Senator from Nevada? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered into.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ELLENDER in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting several nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no reports of committees, the clerk will state the first nomination in order on the calendar.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Carl McFarland, of Montana, to be an Assistant Attorney General of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. McFarland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the President will be notified.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Harry E. Watkins to be United States district judge for the State of West Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to this nomination?

The nomination was confirmed.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the Senate confirmed the nomination of Harry E. Watkins to be United States district judge for the State of West Virginia be reconsidered.

Mr. NEELY. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, one moment, please.

Mr. PITTMAN. A motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. McNARY. A parliamentary inquiry. What is the nature of the motion? At least, good order should be maintained so that we may understand what is going on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] has moved that the vote by which the Senate confirmed the nomination of Mr. Watkins as United States district judge for the State of West Virginia be reconsidered. Thereupon the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] moved to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON. That motion is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia that the motion of the Senator from New Mexico be laid on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. NEELY. I now ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of the confirmation of the nomination of Harry E. Watkins to be United States district judge for the State of West Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the President will be notified.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Joseph C. Reing to be United States marshal for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the Executive Calendar.

RECESS

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, March 3, 1937, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, MARCH 2, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our Father, unrestrained by time or space, Thou art righteous in all Thy ways and holy in all Thy works. Thou art our hope and our portion in the land of the living. Teach us, we pray Thee, to do the thing that pleaseth Thee and let Thy loving spirit lead us forth. We thank Thee for Thy gracious promise: "Thou wilt give him the morning star." We wait upon Thee for light to guide us in all-wise endeavor. Inspire us with unmovable conviction that means character building, truth discovering, and peace promoting. Do Thou let these stand out as the rewarding tasks of this Congress. Help us, therefore, Heavenly Father, to sow good seed, that the harvest may be the fruits of joy, happiness, and contentment. The Lord God look upon our native land with mercy; and let peace, prosperity, and good will reign supreme. In the Savior's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to a joint resolution of the Senate of the following title:

S. J. Res. 84. Joint resolution to authorize the Postmaster General to withhold the awarding of star-route contracts for a period of 60 days.

The message also announced that the Senate had adopted the following resolution:

Senate Resolution 88
(Mar. 1, 1937)

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. HENRY E. STUBBS, late a Representative from the State of California.

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative the Senate do now take a recess until 12 o'clock meridian tomorrow.

THE LATE JOHN J. M'SWAIN

Mr. MAHON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAHON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, when the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives met for the first time during this session the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. LISTER HILL, made some remarks regarding his predecessor as chairman of that committee, the late Representative John J. McSwain, of South Carolina. The members of the committee were so impressed with the speech that they unanimously voted that it be made available to the other Members of Congress, and they asked that I have it properly inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. As the successor in this body of that distinguished statesman who was your beloved colleague and my dear friend, I feel honored that I can have this part in bringing to you so fine and deserved a tribute to his memory. I therefore ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD so that the speech referred to may be printed.

The matter referred to is as follows:

REMARKS OF HON. LISTER HILL, OF ALABAMA, CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, AT THE FIRST MEETING OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE SEVENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION, ON THE LATE HON. JOHN J. M'SWAIN, FORMER CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE AND REPRESENTATIVE FROM SOUTH CAROLINA

Since the last meeting of the committee the former chairman of the committee, our friend, John McSwain, has slipped out of the company of living men. The old members of the committee recall the last meeting of the committee held during the closing days of the last session of Congress, when we met for luncheon as the guest of the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. MCLEAN. On this occasion the members of the committee presented to John McSwain a beautiful silver vase as a token of friendship and of esteem, and it was my privilege to speak of him, of his life, his character, and his public services. I shall not now reiterate what I then said, but I do feel that we should pause for a moment to pay tribute to him whom we knew and loved so well and who for so long was our cherished leader.

At our last meeting we knew that John McSwain would never again sit as chairman or as a member of the committee, for he had announced that he would not again be a candidate for nomination or election to the House of Representatives; but we hoped that his days might be long and that he might be a frequent visitor to the committee. In fact, I had corresponded with him during the summer about the bill to take the profits out of war in which he was so much interested and on which he had labored ever since he had been in Congress, and he had agreed to come and be the first witness before the committee at this session in behalf of the bill. And now he has gone, and gone forever.

A prince once said of a king, "Taller he seems in death", and oftentimes only after death do we properly realize the full measure of a man. As we contemplate John McSwain today, we know that he was not of the common run of men. He was an unusual man—indeed, a remarkable man. He had the genius of common sense. He never tried to fit square pegs in round holes. He knew and understood human nature and saw deep into the motives of men. He had faith in people. He believed in them, in their final judgment, and in the moral standards that moved and at last controlled them. No man ever lived more completely the ideal of Kipling's wonderful little poem "If" than did John McSwain. He could walk with kings and never lose the common touch. He had the oversoul of which Emerson wrote, "the personality that neither flatters nor fails and which never appeals from itself but believes in itself." He was an indefatigable worker. He knew that the world has no use for half-hearted men and that her prizes are for those with energy, devotion, and determination who consume the obstacles which lie in their path. He spent and he was spent.

Inflexible of purpose, of unaffected simplicity and sweetness of nature, John McSwain knew how to soften the asperities of political conflict by the touch of a delicate, whimsical humor and to win the heart and affection of all those with whom he had to do.

John McSwain loved every living thing. He loved the flowers, the birds, the trees, the fields, and the woodlands. He knew them and never was he happier than when he was with them. He read the sermons in the stones, heard the songs in the babbling brooks, and knew that Nature never betrayed the heart that loved her. He was a friend of all mankind, ever extending a helping hand to those struggling up Life's roadway, always lifting burdens and opening the windows to let the light of God's heaven into the dark places. Most of all did he seek to help young men and young women. He was constantly lending aid to boys and girls striving to secure their college education. He was our friend, generous and true. He made no demands; needed no assurances; exacted no promises. He was chief among us because he was the servant of all of us.

John McSwain was brave and gallant. He never placed his trembling hands upon the altar of compromise. He stood foursquare by his conscience, held fast to his guns, and never lowered his flag. He preferred to be right with his conscience rather than right with his constituents or his colleagues. He did not flinch in the face of danger. He rushed to the front and bared his manly breast and took the blows, although they were not always his due. Like all brave men he suffered, but he suffered without complaint or without bitterness. He was a man; he could bear the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune; his soul was "touched to fine issues."

It was in his heart that we found his political philosophy—to strive on and ever on to give disadvantaged men and women a fairer chance and a better day and to so serve his country that common men might own the land.

I was with him at Charleston, S. C., as he lay stricken just 2 days before his death. There was upon his face the same sweet smile which we knew so well and which mirrored the inward greatness of his soul. Even then his was the same gay, gallant spirit which had so characterized him. He laughed and joked with the merry twinkle in his eye, and if he had any thought of the impending summons he gave not the slightest hint. We may be sure that when the summons came and he entered that undiscovered country he did so unafraid, with his head up and with that same sweet smile upon his face ready for the great adventure. Surely the trumpets sounded for him on the other side and he found welcome among the choice and master spirits of the ages.

At the conclusion of the above remarks by Mr. HILL of Alabama, on motion of Mr. MAHON of South Carolina, the members of the Committee on Military Affairs stood with bowed heads for 1 minute as a further tribute to the memory of Mr. McSwain.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BOILEAU asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Immigration may sit tomorrow and Thursday during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—REPORT ON OPERATION OF N. R. A. (H. DOC. NO. 158)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered printed.

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report on the operation of the National Industrial Recovery Administration, which has been prepared by those members of the Committee on Industrial Analysis who have no official relationship to the Government. They are Prof. J. M. Clark, of Columbia University, an economist; Mr. William H. Davis, of New York City, a lawyer; Mr. George M. Harrison, of Cincinnati, Ohio, president of the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks, and also chairman of the Railway Labor Executives Association; and Mr. George H. Mead, of Dayton, Ohio, a manufacturer and former chairman, Business Advisory Council.

This report is based on an exhaustive study of the work of the National Recovery Administration, which has been in progress ever since June 1935, and which has been carried on since March 1936 under the direction of the Committee on Industrial Analysis, which I created by Executive order, which consisted of the four nongovernmental members who make this report, and the Secretaries of Agriculture, Commerce, and Labor. The staff work for this committee has been performed by the Division of Industrial Economics in the Department of Commerce.

This report presents the first adequate survey by an impartial group of the entire work of the National Recovery Administration, reviewing the objectives, the successes and failures of attainment, the administration and the legal problems of the National Recovery Administration. The exhaustive collection of code histories, statistical information, and staff studies, which provided the basis for this report, are now available for further research by students interested in the many phases of the relationships between Government and industry.

The report of the Committee should furnish invaluable aid to the Congress in the consideration and determination of vital legislative problems. This report, with its admirable, well-balanced weighing of controversial issues and its impartial review of complicated factual situations, provides a dispassionate consideration of a host of problems as to which emotion, self-interest, and prejudice have too frequently obscured the truth. It is worthy of the most serious consideration by the Congress and should be made available for widespread study and discussion. In my opinion, it will point the way to the solution of many vexing problems of legislation and administration in one of the most vital subjects of national concern.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—PAY OF CERTAIN CIVILIAN OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

To the Congress of the United States:

There is transmitted herewith a report of the Secretary of State and a proposed draft of legislation designed to authorize the assignment and allotment of pay of civilian officers and employees while performing duty outside the continental limits of the United States.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 2, 1937.

[Enclosures: Report of the Secretary of State; proposed draft of legislation.]

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Private Calendar.

CHARLES E. NAMES

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 1858) for the relief of Charles E. Names.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

ETTA NATELSKY

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1859, for the relief of Etta Natelsky.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Etta Natelsky, of Chicago, Cook County, Ill., the sum of $1,500 in full satisfaction of all claims of said Etta Natelsky against the United States for damages resulting from personal injuries sustained by her on July 22, 1934, when shot by an agent of the Department of Justice, Division of Investigation, in the endeavor of said Department of Justice, Division of Investigation, to apprehend John Dillinger: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

KATE CARTER LYONS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1870, for the relief of Kate Carter Lyons.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Kate Carter Lyons, of Travelers Rest, S. C., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000 in full payment of all claims of the said Kate Carter Lyons for personal injuries received by her when she fell into an excavation on her property at the above address, alleged to have been made by employees of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey in January 1934.

With the following committee amendments:

In lines 6 and 7, strike out the words "in full payment of all claims of the said Kate Carter Lyons" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in full satisfaction of her claim against the United States."

In lines 9, 10, and 11, strike out the words "alleged to have been made by employees of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey in January 1934" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "on June 4, 1934, said excavation having been made in January 1934 and left open by employees of the Civil Works Administration in preparation for the placement of a United States Coast and Geodetic Survey monument therein: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOHN S. HEMRICK

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1871, for the relief of John S. Hemrick.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions and limitations of sections 15 to 20, both inclusive, of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes", approved September 7, 1916, as amended, the United States Employees' Compensation Commission be, and the same is hereby, authorized and directed to receive and consider, when filed, the claim of John S. Hemrick for disability alleged to have been incurred by him during the winter of 1933–34, while in the employ of the Civil Works Administration, and to determine said claim upon its merits under provisions of said act: Provided, That claim hereunder shall be filed within 6 months after the approval of this act: Provided further, That no benefits shall accrue prior to the enactment of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ANNA MUETZEL

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1875, for the relief of Anna Muetzel.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Anna Muetzel, of Chicago, Ill., the sum of $2,500. The payment of such sum shall be in full settlement of all claims against the United States on account of the tragic death of her daughter, Irene Muetzel, who was killed on June 8, 1935, when struck by an automobile driven by George Graziano, a United States post-office employee, assigned to the Chicago (Ill.) post office, who, at the time, was on duty and engaged in his regular duties as a special-delivery messenger, United States Postal Service.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 8, strike out the word "tragic"; page 2, line 3, after the word "service", insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding any limitation relating to the time within which an application for a license must be filed, the Commission of Licensure to Practice the Healing Art in the District of Columbia is authorized and directed to issue a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Clarence Q. Pair, Washington, District of Columbia, in accordance with the provisions of the first paragraph of section 24 of the Healing Arts Practice Act, District of Columbia, 1928.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BROWN M'CUBBIN

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 328, for the relief of Brown McCubbin.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Brown McCubbin the sum of $92.53 in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States for acting as postmaster at Eve, Ky., from April 9, 1933, to June 7, 1933.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to credit the account of Letha F. McCubbin, deceased, former postmaster at Eve, Ky., with $90.58, being part of the amount retained from postal receipts by Brown McCubbin as compensation for his voluntary services in acting as postmaster at that post office from April 10 to June 6, 1933, inclusive.

"SEC. 2. That the Comptroller General is hereby authorized and directed to credit the account of Mary B. Hodge, deceased, former postmaster at Place, Ky., with $48.69, being the amount retained from postal receipts by Maude Hodge as compensation for her voluntary services in acting as postmaster at that post office from January 10 to April 4, 1934, inclusive.

"SEC. 3. That the Comptroller General is hereby authorized and directed to credit the account of Walter H. Mansfield, deceased, former postmaster at Logan, Okla., with $164.33, being the amount retained from postal receipts by Ben F. Morris as compensation for his voluntary services in acting as postmaster at that post office from November 7, 1933, to January 9, 1934, inclusive."

Amend the title.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended.

EVA MARKOWITZ

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 458) for the relief of Eva Markowitz.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Eva Markowitz, of New York City, N. Y., for herself and on behalf of her three minor children, not to exceed $5,000, in monthly installments of $100 each, in full settlement of all claims against the Government on account of the death of her husband, the late Max Markowitz, who was run over by a Government-owned truck and received head injuries on April 30, 1935, when he was being transported from assigned work at the United States Northeastern Penitentiary, Lewisburg, Pa., and as a result of which injuries died on the same day without regaining consciousness: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "who", insert "fell from and."

Page 2, line 3, strike out "and as a result of which injuries died on the same day without regaining consciousness."

Page 2, at the end of the bill, strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided further, That payments hereunder shall commence on the 1st day of the calendar month following the enactment of this act."

The committee amendments were agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

C. E. LANDTISER

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 595) for the relief of C. E. Landtiser.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to C. E. Landtiser the sum of $2,500. Such sum shall be in full settlement of all claims against the United States for damages sustained by Mada Landtiser when an automobile in which she was a passenger collided on September 15, 1934, with a Government truck employed in emergency conservation work at McGregor, Iowa, resulting in personal injuries to the said Mada Landtiser, wife of the said C. E. Landtiser, the claim for damages due to the said Mada Landtiser having been duly assigned to the said C. E. Landtiser, her husband, and which claim has been rejected by the United States Forest Service, at Washington, D. C., because this branch of the Government does not have authority to pay claims for personal injuries.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mada Landtiser, of Malcolm, Poweshiek County, Iowa, the sum of $1,500, in full settlement of all claims against the United States for personal injuries sustained by her when the vehicle in which she was a passenger was struck by an Emergency Conservation Work truck of the Department of Agriculture, on September 15, 1934, near Traer, Iowa: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Mada Landtiser."

HAROLD W. SNELL

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 2771) for the relief of Harold W. Snell.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc, That Harold W. Snell, special representative agent, the Alaska Railroad, with headquarters at Chicago, Ill., is hereby relieved of reimbursing the United States for credit to the appropriation, "Alaska Railroad Special Fund", the sum of $133.91, the amount lost in the burglary of the offices of the Alaska Railroad, 333 North Michigan Avenue, Chicago, Ill., on the night of July 8, 1935.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN DISBURSING OFFICERS OF THE ARMY

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 2772) for the relief of certain disbursing officers of the Army of the United States and for the settlement of individual claims approved by the War Department.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of the following disbursing officers of the Army of the United States the amounts set opposite their names: Capt. Bigelow B. Barbee, Finance Department, $30; Maj. Stephen R. Beard, Finance Department, $30; Capt. George W. Brent, Coast Artillery, $25; Maj. Richard L. Cave, Finance Department, $64; Maj. Walter D. Dabney, Finance Department, $92.30; Maj. Edmund W. McLarren, Finance Department, $30; Capt. Leighton N. Smith, Finance Department, $45; Maj. Arthur O. Walsh, Finance Department, $25; and Capt. Hugh Whitt, Finance Department, $25, said amounts being public funds for which they are accountable and which comprise minor errors in computation of pay and allowances due former members of the Civilian Conservation Corps, who are no longer enrolled in that corps, and which amounts have been disallowed by the Comptroller General of the United States: Provided, That no part of the amounts so credited shall be later charged against any individual other than the various payees.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Capt. William H. Buechner, Tenth Infantry, the sum of $49, representing refundments of overpayments made allottees of Civilian Conservation Corps enrollees, the collection of which amount cannot be effected from the persons to whom such erroneous payments have been made: Provided, That no part of this amount shall be charged to any person other than the payees.

SEC. 3. That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of Maj. John B. Harper, Finance Department, the sum of $1,509.59, public funds for which he is accountable and which represent items disallowed by the Comptroller General of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Capt. Albert J. Leavitt, Engineer Reserve, the sum of $67.48, or so much of said sum as shall have been collected from him prior to the approval of this act, representing refundment of Government funds which were stolen from his Civilian Conservation Corps company safe on April 18–19, 1936: Provided, That no part of this amount shall be charged to any person other than the person committing said theft.

SEC. 5. That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of Capt. Richard Lee, Corps of Engineers, the sum of $583.69, public funds for which he is accountable and which were paid by him to the Memphis Packet Co. for freight shipments by water, and which amount has been disallowed by the Comptroller General of the United States.

SEC. 6. That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of Maj. Charles Lewis, Finance Department, the sum of $295.38, public funds for which he is accountable and which were paid by him on fraudulent vouchers prepared by an employee of the finance office at Fort Benjamin Harrison, Ind.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Capt. Elbert W. Martin, Field Artillery Reserve, the sum of $45.68, public funds for which he is accountable and which were destroyed by fire on the night of November 15–16, 1935, and which sum he has refunded to the United States.

SEC. 8. That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of Maj. Frank E. Parker, Finance Department, the sum of $4,449.80, public money for which he is accountable and which has been disallowed in his accounts by the Comptroller General of the United States on account of payments made to emergency nurses on duty with the Civilian Conservation Corps during the period November 1933 to August 31, 1935, in compliance with the Executive order of the President dated May 8, 1933.

SEC. 9. That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of First Lt. (now Capt.) Alexander H. Perwein, Finance Department, the sum of $2,038, public money for which he is accountable and which was paid in error to Civilian Conservation Corps enrollees on properly certified vouchers for the month of September 1933, and which amount has been disallowed in his accounts by the Comptroller General: Provided, That no part of the amount so credited shall be charged to any person other than the various payees: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Capt. C. McL. Lott, United States Marine Corps, so much of said sum as shall have been collected from him prior to the approval of this act.

SEC. 10. No part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with these claims, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

DROUGHT RELIEF

The SPEAKER. Under the special order, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GEHRMANN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. GEHRMANN. Mr. Speaker, I am very thankful that I have been given 15 minutes this afternoon. I wish I had more time. This is a subject which evidently Congress has forgotten all about. I am referring now to the drought-stricken area, not only of Wisconsin, but of the whole United States. Only last fall our great leader, President Roosevelt, made a trip through part of the drought-stricken area, and when he got into our section it was right after we had had our first rain. Of course, things commenced to look green. It did not look quite as bad as he had anticipated it would. The fact is, however, that the farmers in Wisconsin, especially the 14 counties which I represent, do not have any feed and do not have any credit with which to get feed. There is very little grain threshed in any of the counties I represent.

We have passed a seed loan bill, allotting $50,000,000 to the Farm Credit Administration; but I want to quote some figures to show that a very small percentage of the farmers of the State of Wisconsin and other States can avail themselves of that $50,000,000, because they do not have any credit left. They do not have anything which they own that is not already encumbered to the extent where the Farm Credit Administration will accept it as collateral. Then, of course, we have some funds made available through the Resettlement Administration. Of course, the cry went up that the farmers are well taken care of.

The Resettlement Administration, however, has a very inadequate amount, and this amount is restricted by certain limitations to a certain few farmers that are down and out. They have been and are now on relief. They receive a rehabilitation grant, but this is no more—in fact it is much less than—the people in the city receive who are on direct relief. The balance of the farmers, 75 or 80 percent, are in the same position when they ask for relief or for a loan from the Resettlement Administration that they are when they face the Farm Credit Administration. The Resettlement Administration is as liberal, and perhaps a little more liberal, than the ruling allows the Administration to be. They told several of us who went before the Administration officials that they are stretching a point, that they are satisfied to accept almost anything as security, even second, third, and fourth mortgages on livestock.

The point I want to impress upon you is the futility of saying to these farmers that we are going to help you, we are going to lend you money if you give us a third or fourth mortgage on something. The fact is they are mortgaged to death now and it is impossible for them ever to get out from under. The sooner we realize this fact and get down to really rehabilitating these farmers, the sooner we shall be able to put a great percentage of them who are now down and out back on their feet where they can make a living for themselves, for their distress came about through no fault of their own.

I have figures showing the percentage of mortgaged farms, and the total indebtedness, which I shall put in the RECORD in connection with my speech. This table will prove that not only in my own State, but in 39 out of the 48 States, more than 50 percent of the farms are mortgaged way beyond the present value of the farms.

I am sure that from these figures most of you will find that in your own States the farmers are no better off than they are in Wisconsin. These figures, of course, are taken from the 1930 census. I am sure, however, the conditions have not improved except in a few isolated sections, perhaps in the cotton and tobacco sections, where Government checks the last year or two helped the farmers. The majority of the farmers, however, are worse off today than they were in 1930, and this table of Government figures shows exactly where each State ranks. As I said before, in 39 States 50 percent of the farms are mortgaged. Mississippi heads the list with 83.7 percent of the farms mortgaged. Then follow Oklahoma, Alabama, Georgia, North Dakota, and on down the line. Iowa, which is supposed to be one of the richest agricultural States, is in eighth place, with 77.3 percent of her farms mortgaged. I am speaking of real-estate mortgages.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEHRMANN. Yes.

Mr. BIERMANN. Where did the gentleman get his figures?

Mr. GEHRMANN. From the Agricultural Yearbook.

Mr. BIERMANN. And the gentleman states that the figures show 77 percent of the farms of Iowa are mortgaged?

Mr. GEHRMANN. Seventy-seven and three-tenths percent. The total number of farms in Iowa are 214,928. Out of this number, 166,040 are mortgaged.

Mr. BIERMANN. The gentleman means 77 percent of the number of farms?

Mr. GEHRMANN. Seventy-seven percent of the total number of farms in Iowa are mortgaged.

Mr. BIERMANN. The figures we get on the Committee on Agriculture are 50 and a fraction percent.

Mr. GEHRMANN. These are Government statistics taken from the 1930 census and should be correct. It is possible that the Iowa farmers, perhaps through hog checks, have been able to pay off a portion of their mortgages the last couple of years.

Table showing number of farms, number of mortgaged farms, and percentage of mortgaged farms of the total, as compiled from census of 1930

The farms that are not mortgaged are the farms that have been taken over by the Federal Land banks and other banks, farms that are held for speculation or run by so-called gentlemen farmers, by men who do not actually farm them. The majority of the farms in the States, however, that are operated by the owners are mortgaged.

In this connection may I read just a little clipping that came in a local newspaper from my district today showing the condition. It must be remembered that the farmers' troubles started in 1921, not in 1929. They started back in 1921 when pressure was brought upon the banks, and the banks in turn told the mortgagors that they had to liquidate and pay off their indebtedness. In this connection let me remind you that the farmers in my district of Wisconsin are not a shiftless type. The 14 counties I represent are populated with people of the Scandinavian and Germanic races. They are not spendthrift kind of people, but are the most frugal, industrious, saving, and progressive farmers that ever farmed anywhere. They got their farms in the raw state, so to speak, hewed them out of the wilderness, sacrificed even a decent standard of living for many years in the hope and expectation of having a home for themselves and their children.

After 50 years of working like slaves they and their families are now being evicted, in the majority of cases by a Government agency. Here is the case of one man I know of, and I had tears in my eyes when I read this. I have been associated with him for years and years. There never was a harder-working man than this man to whom I shall refer. His name is Pat Stevens. He happens to be from Mr. HULL's county. He had a foreclosure on February 26, and here is what he says:

All my life I have tried to be a respectable citizen. I have paid my obligations as best I could. I have lived on this farm 58 years, been a citizen of St. Croix County 60 years. I took up this farm out of the wilderness and built up a modern home. I always paid my taxes and interest till the very men I voted for raised interest and taxes so high we could not pay them. The drought came on, and for 6 years we raised no crops. I had to borrow from the Government to feed our livestock. Debts piled up mountain high while we struggled like slaves to prevent it, without help from our Government to save our homes, and we are driven like rats from our homes.

This drought is not a 1-year proposition. In some western Wisconsin counties it has run along for 6 years, with the exception of 1935 when we had rain enough, but we are in a dairy section, and we depend on clover and alfalfa for our dairy feed.

In the dry years of 1933 and 1934 naturally there was not sufficient grass. The grass seed planted those years could not grow, and so emergency crops had to be relied on the following year. In the year 1935, although we had rain, the farmers had to revert to emergency crops for their cattle for reasons stated previously. In 1936 the farmers did plant some more of the high-priced alfalfa and clover seed, but again the drought that year was even worse than it had ever been before. And this year again they will have had to fall back on emergency crops with seed almost unavailable, very high, and no money to buy it with.

Mr. Speaker, those are the prevailing conditions, and I will include here a few tables showing the need for help in a few counties of Wisconsin. Similar conditions prevail all through the drought section.

Conditions in some of drought-stricken counties in Wisconsin

ASHLAND COUNTY

Number of farmers in county	1,450
Number of Federal farm loans	542
Amount involved	$415,700
Number of farmers delinquent	62
Amount involved	$8,321.29
Number of P. C. A. loans	36
Amount involved	$16,393.65

We will need approximately 6,000 bushels of grain for seed and about 5 or 6 thousand pounds of grass seed.

BARRON COUNTY

Number of farms in county	4,639
Number of Federal farm loans	1,500
Amount involved	$5,000,000
Amount delinquent—percent	35
Number of P. C. A. loans	393
Amount involved	$120,661

Survey shows 2,500 applications for drought relief with a debt of $89 per crop acre.

Number of farmers out of feed will be approximately 40 percent by March 1. We will need about 25,000 tons of hay and approximately 25,000 tons of grain. Our 1936 silage crop was one-third of normal.

BURNETT COUNTY

Number of farms in county	1,850
Number of Federal farm loans	750
Amount involved	$1,250,000
Amount delinquent	600
Amount involved	$180,000
Number of P. C. A. loans	50
Amount involved	$100,000
Number of other chattels	500
Amount involved	$150,000

The number of farmers who are practically out of feed now or will be by March 1 and who cannot purchase on account of lack of funds is 500.

Our seed and feed needs will amount to about $160,000.

CLARK COUNTY

Number of farms in county	5,348
Number of Federal farm loans	1,250
Amount involved	$550,000
Number of farmers delinquent	320
Amount involved	$60,000
Number of P. C. A. loans	700
Amount involved	$200,000

60 to 70 percent are borrowing money for feed or seed in some form.

Practically 60 percent of the farmers will be out of feed by March 1.

The county agricultural committee estimated that the county will need $500,000 for feed and seed needs.

180 farmers are delinquent in last year's taxes.

POLK COUNTY

Number of farms in the county	4,386
Number of Federal farm loans	1,067
Amount involved	$2,796,000
Number of P. C. A. loans	453
Amount involved	$30,821.37
Number of delinquent Federal farm loans (34 out of 82)	478
Amount involved	$76,359.18

There are about 80 percent of the farmers who will be out of feed by March 1 and who will not be able to purchase it.

There are 800 Commissioners loans with a total amount of $1,000,000.

LINCOLN COUNTY

Number of farmers in county	2,106
Number of Federal farm loans	456
Amount involved	$1,596,000
Number of delinquent loans—percent	28.3
Number of delinquency in tax—do	16.5
Number of farmers out of feed	700

Number of farmers needing feed this spring, about one-third of all.

95 percent of all seed grain will have to be purchased.

TAYLOR COUNTY

Number of farms in county	3,250
Debts per cleared acre	100

It will take about 16,000 to 20,000 tons of feed to replace grain lost by drought. Seed bill for this coming spring is estimated at $150,000 to $200,000.

RUSK COUNTY

Number of farms in county	2,600
Number of Federal farm loans	900
Amount involved	$1,200,000
Number of loans with other agencies	907
Amount involved	$1,307,000
Number of P. C. A. loans	150
Amount involved	$150,000
Number of farmers delinquent to Federal Farm Loan Association	221
Amount involved	$300,000

Approximately 2,400 farmers will be out of feed by March 1 and will not be financially able to purchase more.

All seed for county must be bought, and old system of 1936 will not help. Amount needed is $80,000. Amount needed for feed is $100,000.

WASHBURN COUNTY

Number of farmers	1,754
Number of Federal farm loans	530
Amount involved	$1,060,000
Number of P. C. A. loans	45
Amount involved	$15,500
Number of farmers delinquent, approximately	135
Amount involved	$250,000
Number of other chattels	1,305
Amount involved	$326,250
Number of farmers needing feed	850
Feed needs (2,500 tons of hay)	$27,500
Grain (2,000 tons)	$80,000

BAYFIELD COUNTY

Number of farms in county	1,700
Number of Federal farm loans	529
Amount involved	$962,400
Number of P. C. A. loans, estimated	150
Amount involved	$12,000
Number of farmers delinquent in payments of Federal farm-loan associations (Federal land bank and Commissioners' loans)	157
Amount involved	$14,923

Feed and seed needs: Practically every farmer will have to buy grain seed, which must be shipped in, and at least 90 percent of the farmers will have to buy grass seed, 90 percent of which has to be shipped in.

It seems that it takes a flood disaster, such as we had recently, to call the attention of Congress to the need of the American people. While this is perhaps not as bad as the flood, because it came about slowly, but certainly it deserves and must have our attention. A flood disaster comes within a few hours or a few days, and naturally the sympathies of the American people and the Congress are aroused to the need. But we have not fully realized the need of those people out there who have been slowly starving for the last 5 or 6 years. That is the condition I want to call attention to. Something must be done. We cannot help those farmers by simply providing money and saying to them, "Now, you have to give collateral so you can borrow more money."

These farmers are anxious and willing to work for the amount of money they may receive. But why should the farmers be discriminated against any more than their city cousins who, when they cannot be provided with jobs, are given at least the necessities of life? The minute a farmer asks for money, he is compelled to give security or he cannot be helped. May I ask, Is not the prosperity of this Nation based on agricultural prosperity? If so, let us give the farmers a chance at least to earn that money and to work for it. They are willing to do that.

Mr. Speaker, with this situation in mind I have introduced a bill—H. R. 2537. This bill provides for $100,000,000 to aid in the purchase of feed and seed, and to be repaid with labor on local projects. There are other similar bills pending. I do not care which bill is acted upon, but something should be done so that these farmers will not be compelled to give security for the things they have to have to save their herds and to furnish them with the money they need to take care of their dairy herds. They should be allowed to work on some local projects.

Many of us have spent quite a lot of time with the Resettlement Administration. We have taken the matter up with Mr. Wallace and Mr. Hopkins, and they tell us a change is necessary in the present law in order to allow them to do these things. It seems the departments feel it cannot be done unless an act of Congress is passed to allow the farmers to borrow this money without having them sign a note, but instead sign a work order, so that when the time comes the farmer can go out and repay that money with labor, the same as the people who live in the cities.

Mr. Speaker, I am willing to go as far as anyone to help those in the flood area. I am willing to do anything for the people in the city, because I realize that we cannot and must not stop relief now. However, after all, we do not want to entirely forget the farmers, who for the last 5 or 6 years have been living in that drought area. It is not going to help any by making it possible for them to borrow more money.

Mr. Speaker, I have here just a few short letters from some of the Wisconsin county agents, and I want to quote from them.

Enclosed please find résumé of the financial situation of farmers in 29 of the drought-stricken counties in Wisconsin. I want to particularly call your attention to the number of farms that have Federal farm loans and commissioners' loans and the amount of money that is involved in these loans, with the number of delinquencies that exist at the present time.

Secretaries of farm loan associations inform me that these delinquencies will mount within the next few months. Unless these farmers can keep their cattle there will be no possible chance for these loans to be repaid.

I do not want to quote all of these letters.

We have been trying to stop the collection, at least temporarily, of past-due loans which have been made to farmers for seed and feed. We have been assured they are not troubling the farmers; in fact, they have agreed to hold up collection until these farmers can harvest another decent crop, but correspondence has proven the contrary. I have received many letters from individuals, from secretaries of various associations, and from county agents. This is a letter from one of the agents in my district:

Would like to see if you can do anything to ease up the Government seed loan collectors. Some of our farmers seem to get unduly scared when asked for payments and turn over their soil-conservation checks, milk assignments, or other scanty funds which are much needed for seed and feed purchases this winter and in some cases even food for humans.

Mr. Speaker, I have evidence to prove that soil-conservation checks issued the farmers are being held up and turned over to the Farm Credit Administration. Now, what are those farmers going to do? They are very, very small at best in our section of the country, because we could not qualify under the soil-conservation program.

Mr. GEHRMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LEWIS of Colorado in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEHRMANN. This subject, of course, is very dear to my heart, and naturally it takes quite a while for me to discuss it.

This shows that even the few dollars now due under the soil-conservation program, as I was about to say, only applies to a very small percentage of our farms, because half or more of our farms are in either clover or alfalfa, so they could not qualify with more than 15 percent of the total acreage of the farms and therefore would receive only a very small grant under the soil conservation program. I am quite sure the average in my district is much less than $100, and even with this little amount, which the farmer needs so badly, he could only buy, perhaps, a little feed or a few groceries or a few tons of hay, and this is being held up or demanded by another Government agency; in other words, one department or bureau is helping the other to hold out the money that the farmer so badly needs.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEHRMANN. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. Yesterday I called the Resettlement Administration relative to the oat loans made in 1934, and the Resettlement Administration advised me that that department would subordinate any lien they now hold against said farmers, which would enable farmers to make new loans in order to farm this year.

Mr. GEHRMANN. Perhaps they would do that, but nevertheless it would not do us much good for the farmer to place one lien on top of another. He is not going to be able to get out of the mire in that way.

To prove further that they are still insisting on collections, I have here another clipping from one of the very best counties in my district, with the very best farmers in our State, the Polk County Agricultural Committee, which recently held a meeting, and this is what they say in a resolution which they adopted:

Because of the present critical situation with reference to the purchase of feed for dairy cattle and seed for spring planting, this committee wishes to go on record as protesting the collection of accounts for feed and seed loans until July 1, 1937.

We feel especially concerned about the demands made on some farmers for further cream-check assignments at the present time on account of the very critical situation in this county. Most of the farmers need every cent of income for the purchase of feed for livestock, food for families, and seed for spring planting.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. GEHRMANN. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. I do not wish to unduly interrupt the gentleman's speech here, but the popular cry all over this country from our farmers who secured oat loans in 1934 has been that they could not make new loans because of the liens now held against their stock by the Resettlement Administration, but since the Resettlement Administration has agreed within the last 3 or 4 days to subordinate their liens to the Farm Credit Administration, it would seem as if that would satisfy the gentleman.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEHRMANN. I yield.

Mr. HULL. May I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that a great many of these loans are made by the National Farm Credit Administration, and I would like to have the gentleman or anybody else in Washington point out where the National Farm Credit Administration has waived a lien for anybody or for any purpose.

Mr. GEHRMANN. I agree with the gentleman [Mr. HULL], and I have had letters and I have personally talked with some men in the Farm Credit Administration, and I am advised that it is absolutely impossible or against the law for them to waive any priority with respect to their loans. So, naturally, they do not do it. The Resettlement Administration might do that, but the Farm Credit Administration refuses to do it.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEHRMANN. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman seems to be of the opinion they are going to waive their liens. I wonder if it is going to help the farmer any for a department down here to waive its liens on last year's crops.

Mr. GEHRMANN. That is exactly what they mean; that they would waive their liens on last year's crops.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEHRMANN. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Can the gentleman inform us what attitude the Government agencies take with reference to balances unpaid after foreclosures are made? Do they take judgment against the farmer?

Mr. GEHRMANN. To be frank with the gentleman I do not know of any case in my district where foreclosures have been made on chattel mortgages made for feed or seed loans. They usually get cream-check assignments and they are satisfied to drag it along for several years in that way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Oregon [Mrs. HONEYMAN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mrs. HONEYMAN. Mr. Speaker, Congress, at its seventy-fourth session, adopted the Neutrality Act, which, it may be expected, will be amended and strengthened during the present session.

That act, declaring this Nation's purpose that we shall become involved in no foreign wars, opens the way at this time for adoption of a national defense policy.

What could be a more natural complement to our neutrality policy than a defense policy adapted to that declaration and giving, as we may term it, "force and effect."

Our Nation, with the possible exception of a sovereign power in the Far East, is more fortunately situated for defense of its shores than most other nations.

Three thousand miles of water separate our country from Europe; 4,000 miles by the great circle route of the Pacific, from Asia. To the north and south of us are nations both friendly and with similar interests.

No effective fighting force could be landed on our shores today by a hostile power. With every facility for the debarkation of troops, with many ports open to our transports, it required a year for us to place an effective combatant army in France during the World War.

I have no fear whatever of any invasion of land forces capable of attaining a foothold on our soil. Nor am I alarmed, if our defenses are adequate, about an invasion by air. For many months a fleet of bombing planes assembled from several nations and manned by trained and proficient pilots has battered at one south European city, and that city still stands with its flag unchanged. That city at the outset did not even have elementary defenses against invasion by air.

There may be some military-minded persons who will argue that the best defense is a good offense. I doubt if that holds true in time of war. Defendant nations have the tremendous advantage of placement and replacement, of availability of supplies, of mobility of troops and labor battalions, and, most of all, of morale.

I believe in a strong defensive policy, in adequate protection against all forms of armed attack, in full preparation to meet any possible attempts at encroachment on our territory. I believe this may be accomplished more effectively and quickly by concentrating our naval and military programs to this end and by eliminating all phases of that program which might constitute needless preparation for aggressive warfare. Our Nation, by adoption of its neutrality policy, has committed itself against aggression. Let us support that pledge by a policy of armed preparation for defense of our territory only. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under special order heretofore entered, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] is recognized for 15 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I believe it would be helpful if I should make at this juncture an explanatory statement with regard to the judgeship retirement bill which has very recently been enacted into law.

During the discussions of the Supreme Court judgeship retirement bill which has just become law many inaccurate statements calculated to embarrass a retiring Justice have been repeatedly made. The most frequent, perhaps, is that the bill retires these judges with full pay for life; that the bill grants them full pay for life if and when they retire. That is not correct.

These judges are given full pay for life by section 1 of article III of the Constitution, which reads:

> The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their office during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

The bill does not attempt to touch the matter of salary. It could not do it. It is fixed in the Constitution that, subject to good behavior, these judges are placed in office for life, and Congress cannot ever reduce the pay of these judges as long as they live.

What this bill does, and all that it does, is to give to the Supreme Court Judges, at the same age and same amount of service, the same right to retire from regular service on the Bench and have a similar opportunity to do lighter service, which in 1919 Congress gave to the judges of the district courts and circuit courts of appeals.

Whatever may be in dispute, there can be no difference of opinion about the fact that while Congress was giving to other judges in 1919 the right to retire to lighter duties when they reach 70 years of age and with 10 years' service Congress definitely and specifically declined in that act to give to Justices of the Supreme Court the same right to retire, or any right to retire. This is the pertinent language of that act:

> But, instead of resigning, any judge, other than a Justice of the Supreme Court, who is qualified to resign under the foregoing provisions may retire * * *. (Sec. 260, Judicial Code.)

Put it another way, by that act of 1919 we said to these district and circuit judges: "When you become 70 years old and have served 10 years and feel you are not quite equal to the full burden of the court, we should be glad for you to retire from your regular duties and accept certain lighter work, if you are willing to do it." In that same act, in the clearest sort of language, we said to these Supreme Court Justices: "Notwithstanding you may have reached 70 years of age and have had 10 years of service, and regardless of how you may feel, we do not want you to retire; we decline to give you the right to retire to lighter duties which we are giving to these other judges. You stay on the Bench, or you will be penalized by the loss of judicial status and your constitutional protection as to compensation, which is preserved for the other Federal judges." That is exactly what we said to these men on the Supreme Court Bench. What does this bill do, then? It merely removes that discrimination, gives to these Justices of the Supreme Court for the first time exactly what in 1919 was given to all other judges, and preserves for them exactly the same character of judicial status and constitutional protection provided for these other judges by the act of 1919.

That is not all, and we want to be fair about the matter. When Mr. Justice Holmes was moving toward his ninetieth year of age and his thirtieth year of service on the Supreme Court, in the press, in conversation, everywhere, he was referred to as the "grand old man" of the Supreme Court, still on the job. Thus, by direct legislative action and by the universal acclaim of Mr. Justice Holmes' remaining on the Bench when he was not only 70 but 90, we not only would not permit these Justices of the Supreme Court to retire but approved and encouraged their continuance on the bench.

That is not all. Two years ago the House of Representatives had the issue squarely presented, "Shall these Supreme Court Justices 70 years old and of 10 years' service be permitted to leave the Bench for lighter duties exactly as is true as to other Federal judges?" That was presented in a bill identical in legal effect with the one just passed, and it was defeated. I am not criticizing anybody, but these are the facts.

This bill just passed affords the first and only opportunity which Justices of the Supreme Court of 70 years of age, or any age or length of service, have had to retire from the regular duties of that Court with the possibility of lighter work. There is no coercion about it. It is a privilege which the Congress, the policy-fixing branch of the Government, respectfully extends to these persons who hold the places of highest responsibility in the judiciary branch of the Government. By a vote of 316 to 72 in the House and 72 to 4 in the Senate this privilege was extended. Congress has made this arrangement. It will never be regarded, and it is unfair to intimate it, that when these Justices reach the point where they feel they should ease up in their work, and that the public interest requires that their regular duties be assigned to a younger person, that there would be any lack of self-respect to retire under the provisions of this bill. They would only be cooperating with their Government which has extended to them that privilege. The public ought to know that if any of these gentlemen of the Supreme Court retire they do it voluntarily. They do it because they feel it is fair to themselves and fair to their Government which gives to them this privilege.

If ever there was a time which required that we keep our feet on the ground and our heads on our shoulders, it is now. As we look upon the problems of the moment and anticipate those which we know are in process of development, we know they will challenge our best efforts as a united people. We know that only such a people, a united people, can win free of the things which now stifle and bleed and make horrible the lives of many other peoples of the earth. We are not beyond the reach of this contagion. We are not immune. Quarrels of individuals and the clashing of ambitions have no place here.

We can do a lot of hurt now by loose talk.

This Court matter can be worked out without hurt to the public interest, without leaving any scars, if unselfish, patriotic motives guide our efforts. There is no inherent reason why this cannot be done if that cooperation and mutually respectful attitude of the legislative branch, the executive branch, and the judicial branch of the Government for each other and that regard for the Nation's interest is shown which the country has a right to expect in this emergency. That will make the desired result not only probable but certain.

Unless we all take that attitude this matter can easily get beyond control and drive deep lines of cleavage not only between the departments of the Government but into the structure of the citizenship at a time above all others in our history when we need the strength of unity and the effectiveness of cooperation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LEWIS of Colorado). Under the special order previously entered, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I do greatly admire the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], who just spoke to you. I am at all times extremely desirous of avoiding his criticisms. In consequence I hope that what I may have to say today he will not regard as loose talk.

I appreciate, with you, how fortunate we are that we have a man of his intellectual attainments to share with us the thought that we should be exceeding careful of loose statements at this time. I have, however, found it very necessary, in order to focus any attention on a really serious subject in these recent Congresses, to stigmatize it in some way. Otherwise the subject is likely to receive scant attention. So, as you may perhaps say, "according to his usual custom", I am trying to place before you what I consider a very serious condition. Although some of you may already have been amused by the following verses, written by someone signing himself merely "E. C. M" and hence practically anonymous, which appeared a few days ago, I will regale you with them now:

GOOD-BYE AMERICA

Farewell, O land of yesteryear;
A patriot stands before thy bier,
Lamenting, bids a sad adieu.
Democracy no more—a few,
With gall that leaves me all aghast
Consign thy glories to the past.
We live, they shout, in a new age;
Our fathers' foresight, we thought sage,
Is cast aside—discredited.
Blind fools they were it now is said.
Change is a fetish with this crew—
Nothing is sacred if not new.
Old virtues such as thrift and truth,
Our word upon a bond—forsooth;
Explained away with scornful phrase,
As good for horse and buggy days.
A law's a law now only when
It meets the views of New Deal men.
Our bulwark gone—the Court Supreme Must now endorse each crack-pot scheme.
And so a glorious era ends,
Tinkered to death by well-meant friends.
Our edifice is but a shell—
America—a long farewell!

Please do not credit me with having entirely the same viewpoint because those are not my own words, but I have presented them for whatever value they may have in setting forth, in a practical manner, some of the fears shared by many of us.

Again I rejoice with you today that so many of the New Dealers are beginning to see the light. So many of you Democrats come to me and say, "I rather think we see eye to eye in most of these matters." It is a new era, under a benevolent dictatorship, and unto it, so many say, we should surrender all our own opinions. We hear so much about "the mandate of the people" lately. I read the article by Arthur Krock in the New York Times on Sunday. If you have not read it, you should do so. It contains much food for thought. If that was the result of intimate interviews, will he eventually receive the same treatment that Dr. Stanley High has received? Or was he talking by the book? As I read it I felt that he was surely authorized to write the way he did. He was apparently authorized to say that the President thinks that no matter what he may have said or promised in his speeches and fireside chats before the election, in view of the tremendous victory, he can now assume to himself the authority of the people to do exactly the opposite of what he had promised. As an example, while he said that he would seek a clarifying amendment to the Constitution, now he claims, in effect, that he has received a mandate from the people to take a short cut to his objective by the shocking method of packing the Supreme Court.

He seems to say: "I must do this in the next 3 years. We have no time to seek amendments." He is not satisfied to prepare the groundwork for others to carry on. It is often said: "No good man should want such power; no bad man should have it." Packing the Court will not be deemed the work of a "benevolent" dictator.

The talk I wish to make today, however, is on the subject of taxes, and I shall take only a few minutes, having several years ago spent a great deal of time on that subject—one in which I am still greatly interested. I speak this afternoon because the topic was brought to my attention by an article in this morning's paper commenting on the views of Mr. Morgenthau. He appeared to exclaim, "What, $1,000,000,000 for a housing program? Why, I had not previously studied that proposal!" According to the President's Budget message, there is no way to provide $1,000,000,000 for a housing program, save by taxation! The Secretary refers you to the President's Budget message, which reads, in part, as follows:

Expenditures must be planned with a view to the national needs. No expansion of Government expenditure should be authorized unless the necessity of the expansion has been definitely determined and the funds provided to defray the cost. In other words, if new legislation imposes any substantial increased expenditures either in existing or the creation of new activities, it becomes a matter of sound policy simultaneously to find the money for this new activity.

Yet we have had crop insurance, farm tenancy, and a grist of things requested by the President himself; things that are going to cost many millions, and perhaps even billions, of dollars. But now Mr. Morgenthau seems frightened, and recently stated that he is trying to work in harmony with the Federal Reserve Board. He is not borrowing any money this month because the danger of more "credit money", so-called, must now be recognized. It has remained for him, in the face of the many suggestions for further spending made by the President himself, to say to us: "We must not borrow any more money; taxes must be imposed and revenue provided for any further New Deal expenditures. The President so stated in his Budget message.

It now begins to appear that the President himself has forgotten that he put that statement therein.

Now, my people are altogether too burdened by taxes. I see one of my good friends on this side of the House who once stated on the floor, when discussing our income tax, that we had not begun to approach the taxes which Englishmen had to pay. This is not so. The income-tax brackets are higher in England, of course. But where he lives and where I live, the poor man with the little home and the little family pays some $30 per $1,000, or more, on his real estate, the home that he lives in, to meet the expenses of the municipality. In England the central government pays fully one-half of all such local expenditures, which our citizens are called upon to meet. Everybody ought to know, and I think everybody who has studied the subject does know, that we in the United States have already reached what the ordinary man in Great Britain has to pay in taxes. Now, if we are to have new taxes imposed, from what sources are they to be expected? For some time I have told my audiences that there is one thing particularly in which I must request their assisting suggestions. I have asked them to write me telling me where we could get more revenue, in order, if possible, to find out something more that the Federal Government can tax; but of the many thousands of people to whom I have thrown that gauntlet not a single one has written me a letter making any suggestion. Have any of you received any?

I must talk about these matters rather hurriedly; such as some of the abominable methods now employed to wring money from our people. Political economy! The other day a child, answering the teacher's question, "What is political economy?" replied, "How you can get the most votes with the least money."

No wonder he had that viewpoint. Yet we must now find some other ways to extract more tax money from our people. We must pay for excesses of expenditures that brought the votes. I wish to explain to you, if I may, how unfair it is on the poor home owner, already taxed to the limit of his ability to pay, with the tax collector constantly pursuing him, tax sales and deficiency judgments hounding him for the rest of his life, as is amply demonstrated by the startling number of H. O. L. C. foreclosures, day by day. In some towns they cannot even pretend to collect these real-estate taxes. Not long ago I was in a gentleman's office in a nearby State and was astonished to see the whole side of the office covered with framed permits and licenses, or occupancy taxes imposed to make up deficiencies in the collection of real-estate taxes. And yet you talk about the Englishman being taxed more than we are. It just is not so.

But I am going to try to make a sort of constructive suggestion, if I may. I find it in the history of the intangible property tax. I should like sometime to talk about our present income tax—and, before I forget it, I will say that your income-tax method costs our people probably $600,000,000 at present merely to make their returns. Think that over. It is an income tax which, in many ways, is extremely unfair. It taxes the efficient to take care of the inefficient, next door, who is in competition with him. There are so many phases of it that are wrong, that one almost forgets the principle that he who can afford to pay ought to pay.

However, it is my desire to speak about intangible property, so-called.

Should intangibles be taxed when no income is derived from them? Why should your real estate and mine be taxed when it has no income? If bonds and stocks are not paying an income why should they be hidden from sight and not pay any tax at all?

Let me go back for a moment to 1906 when Mr. Carnegie received $6,000,000, as I recall it, for bonds that he received at that time. New York State had a rate of perhaps $25 on intangible property and real estate. He practically said, "If you tax me $25 a thousand on that $6,000,000 I will move over in Pennsylvania where the rate is $4 a thousand on this kind of wealth and where one does not even have to make a sworn return. They only guess, and their guesses are very attractive to those holding this kind of wealth."

Immediately, as I recall it, the Assembly of New York was convened. They passed a registration tax of $5, I believe, and that is all those intangibles could be taxed during their existence. Later the State adopted an income tax.

I remember in 1916 I passed through a period of excitement over methods to tax these intangibles in my own State. Rhode Island and Connecticut had a $3 tax on intangibles and required no sworn return. Their citizens could move right into New York, which had finally passed a bill involving a tax of only 1 percent on $10,000 of income, 2 percent on $20,000, and only 3 percent on $50,000. How attractive. Massachusetts, of course, found herself in the same position as Rhode Island and Connecticut, and dared not attempt to enforce the tax laws. This will now show how radical I am for the moment.

The State of Massachusetts had to do something, because the wealthy men were ready to transfer their intangibles to these tax havens. I was a member of the legislature at that time and we attempted to pass a law providing for a $3 tax on intangible property whether or not income was earned. We were not successful in that effort. Wealthy citizens banded together and really put on a most efficient lobby. It was finally determined not to tax intangibles except on income. A straight 6-percent income tax was enacted, $5,000 of intangibles with an income of $300 a year would be taxed 6 percent of $300, or $18. Real estate would and does pay $30 a thousand or $150, as against $18—What do you think of it? And no tax unless income is received. We cannot take our real estate to the stock market any day and sell when we please, and for the market value as it may be determined from day to day. Intangibles have this tremendous advantage as investments.

In some ways we cannot reach the wealthy. Ohio and Illinois did not seem to desire an income tax. Why do such States condone the escape of this form of wealth? I spoke to a gentleman from Oregon about the same situation. Oregon once had a little so-called super-income tax, I think for educational purposes. It was very small, and was superimposed on other taxes. But the real result was to force those who had wealth to disclose the source of their income. Then they could be reached for tax purposes. I am radical in this matter for the moment. If you tax this kind of wealth in one State, it will move to another. If you tax its possessors too high in one community of a State, they will hang mistletoe on their coattails and relocate in a more friendly one.

I trust this conversation of mine with reference to intangible property has convinced you I do have a little radicalism in me. However, there is so much radicalism abroad in the land today, as I have often said, that I grasp the conservative end of the rope and I pull as hard as I can. I trust the suggestion that there is still a field for just revenue from non-income-paying intangible property will be considered by some as a constructive one; and, as compared with the great burden of real-estate and income taxes, a mild rate of tax, of uniformity may well be considered.

As the previous speaker stated this afternoon, it is time to keep our heads on our shoulders. It is time to be reasonable. This is not the time to pass oppressive tax bills. We should bar what might be termed "legal thievery." It is also time to reconsider and amend the last tax bill, so ill-advised in its frantic attempts to dip into necessary reserves held for payment of debts and replacements.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order heretofore entered, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McSWEENEY] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. McSWEENEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 7 minutes at the conclusion of the previous orders already entered for today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, I was one of the first Members from Ohio to espouse the cause of the President with regard to the Supreme Court. I wish, first of all, to make myself clear with regard to two or three points in this issue. When I think of men who have reached an advanced age I think of a portion of a poem by the great Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, called "Morituri Salutamus", in which he tells to the old men who, like himself, had gone back to Bowdoin College to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of their graduation, a hopeful story.

> But why, you ask me, should this tale be told
> To men grown old, or who are growing old?
> It is too late! Ah, nothing is too late
> Till the tired heart shall cease to palpitate.
> Cato learned Greek at 80;
> Sophocles wrote his grand Oedipus, and Simonides
> Bore off the prize of verse from his compeers,
> When each had numbered more than fourscore years,
> And Theophrastus, at fourscore and ten,
> Had but begun his "Characters of Men."
> Chaucer, at Woodstock with the nightingales,
> At 60 wrote the Canterbury Tales;
> Goethe at Weimar, toiling to the last,
> Completed Faust when 80 years were past,
> These indeed are exceptions; but they show
> How far the gulf-stream of our youth may flow
> Into the arctic regions of our lives,
> Where little else than life itself survives.

I mention this because there are exceptions that show how men often have unusual mental attainments and physical vigor after they have passed the threescore-year-and-ten mark.

You and I, as Members of a great representative body, cannot legislate for specialties such as these; you and I must legislate for generalities. In other words, we cannot specifically pick out that distinguished Justice, Oliver Wendell Holmes, and say, "You may serve beyond the 70-year mark", and that another Justice may not. We must legislate for averages, and I want to impress upon the membership of this House that I am not against a man on this Court merely because he attains a certain age. The President's proposal in no way takes that man from his service. It merely does what we used to do in the Army—it infiltrates.

I remember as an humble machine-gun officer having the replacements come up gradually, and I remember how consoling it was to the new man to come in and have a moment beside the man who had already seen service. It steadied him down. It gave him confidence. And I am for that type of procedure in the Supreme Court.

I do not wish to be classed as a rubber stamp merely because I follow our great leader, the President. I had the honor to serve under Mr. Coolidge, and I may say to our Republican friends that many, many times I was proud of his suggestions, and I was glad as a Democrat to support him.

I have been a school teacher and I have taken issue with my superintendent when he said we should try to inculcate in the hearts and minds of our boys and girls that they must be leaders. I took issue by saying that leadership is only relative. "There must be someone to follow, and as an humble teacher in the public-school system of my home town I am going to try to inspire youngsters to be reasonable, sensible, and logical followers."

When I find a great leader I am one who is willing to go along with him and not be merely a wrench in the gears of his smooth-running machine.

I mention this because, although I dislike to do it, I must take issue with a colleague from Ohio and a personal friend Mr. LAMNECK. I resent his ingratiating himself with his constituents at home at the expense of his colleagues in the House. I do not wish to ingratiate myself with my colleagues in the House, but at the same time I feel there is a certain esprit de corps in this legislative body that must be maintained, and I feel that when we are classed by one of our Members as rubber stamps, it is unfair.

I was taught by my father in my youth never to have any mass prejudices, and, in my opinion, to say that Congress is a rubber stamp is expressing a mass prejudice, because there are many, many outstanding, fearless, courageous, and patriotic men and women in this Congress who are trying to do their best to solve the great problems that are confronting our country.

First of all, let me say I am not against men because they are old, but I like the President's proposal because it allows younger men to serve on the Supreme Court and has what I consider two distinct advantages: One for the man who accepts the position on the bench as a younger member and the other advantage is for the man who is already sitting upon the bench.

You and I naturally reflect our personal experiences. I came to the Sixty-eighth Congress as the next to the youngest Member of that Congress. The only younger Member was my present distinguished colleague the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL].

One of my vivid memories of this service in Congress was my sitting beside a great and distinguished fellow Ohioan, the late Senator Burton. From him I gleaned all that I could about the rules and precedents of the House. I am frank to say that as a young ex-service man I came here thinking I would do this for the ex-service man, this for the farmers and this for the laborers, and this and that for other groups.

And, sitting beside that venerable gentleman of long experience, I learned that those things could not be done hastily. I learned from him many other things. Often he would leave his brief case on an adjoining seat so that I could sit beside him. On many occasions I expressed my gratitude to Mr. Burton for his help, but one time he said to me, "Young man, did you ever stop to think that I am gleaning something from the enthusiasm and patriotism and forward-looking attitude that you have; I am getting something from you." Of course, that was really pleasing to me. What I want to bring to your attention is that I served a legislative apprenticeship under a man with whom I differed on fundamental philosophies of government, but I feel I gained much from him, and I say this with all the sincerity of my heart.

I think that young men going on the bench can learn much from their association with men already on the bench, and that they, if they happen to be what you might call radical, may be somewhat tempered in attitude by association with these splendid men who have given long service in this highest judicial tribunal of the world. There is also an advantage to the man who already sits on the bench. Let us suppose he retires after having a year's, or 6 months', or even 5 years' association with this newer man who has been appointed. He leaves that position feeling that his ideas are to be carried on to some degree by this one who has been associated with him and who succeeds him. Would it not be a source of gratification to you were you an older man, with all the splendid and venerable services that Oliver Wendell Holmes has rendered to his country, to see younger men sitting on the Supreme Bench who in some measure had imbibed your philosophy? Instead of having that office left vacant, and not knowing to whom it was to be given, you would know whom your successor was. To me that would be a source of gratification, and I think those are the two advantages, both to the new judge and to the old judge.

I want to take issue, if I may, with my distinguished friend, Mr. FISH. I claim this is not a matter for constitutional amendment as he does. We all agree that it is our right as Members of Congress to do this. Many of my constituents write to me and say this is too big a question not to refer it to the people in the form of a constitutional amendment. I have answered, "If you want me to crawl into a hole when I am confronted with a big question, then keep me at home. I am here to try in my humble way to solve the big problems along with the little ones, and I am not going to crawl into a hole when I meet a big one, and I am not going to pass it back to the people as if I were afraid to meet it." This issue is one of the responsibilities placed upon Congress by the Constitution and it is one that you and I as legislators should accept. I say again with all the sincerity of my heart, it is much less serious to the country to keep JOHN MCSWEENEY from being the Congressman at large from Ohio than it is for JOHN MCSWEENEY to vote to put into the Constitution things that are statutory and do not belong in the Constitution.

Today we are always using the universal language of baseball and football. I happened after leaving college to act as referee for football games, and I remember distinctly that I could never see who had the ball unless I got right into the rough and tumble of the game. I often came out of the game just as much disheveled as one of the players. I do not deny in any way the right to these distinguished Justices to have this beautiful marble edifice, in which their Court sits as referees, but I think it would be well for them to leave it occasionally and go out to the circuits and meet the other men who are struggling with great legal problems, as well as to come in contact with the people. If there are additional judges, men younger, they can go out and get on the circuits, and, like the referee, they can get under the pile and see who really has the ball. They cannot see it from where they are here in this Capital City.

Again I say that we reflect our early training. I remember as a boy going out with my father and mother and the rest of the family on Sunday afternoons for a drive. When we came to a steep hill my father used to make one of us boys get out on one side and one on the other side to loosen the checkreins on the horses, in order to make the pull up the hill a little easier. This procedure can be applied to our present situation. We might call the old horse today constitutional government. Constitutional government has been drawing along a whole mass of material and corporate rights.

We in America never have had to think much about our people. We have always had free lands, and when a man was not satisfied with his environment, and with the progress he could make in a certain vicinity, he was allowed to pack up his family and go on to free land and have new hope and opportunity. Many of you Members of Congress reflect that splendid spirit of the West where these men went. Now we have no frontier. We have people among us, people who have to be taken care of from a humanitarian and social point of view. As I say the old horse constitutional government has only pulled along corporate interests, has only pulled along the material interests of our country, and now, under the President's plan, the men and women who have been trudging up the hill all these years are going to have a chance to ride in the old cart of government.

I say to you that unless you and I jump out as I did as a boy, and loosen the check rein, which is the Supreme Court, you and I will be confronted with a tragedy, because the Government will become exhausted, and the old horse, democracy, may stumble and the thing that will happen is a snapping of the check rein.

I want the Supreme Court to continue as a referee. I am against definite elections to that Court. I am against 10-year tenures. I am for a life tenure. I am for those men having as long service as their physical and mental well-being permits them to have, but I like the President's idea of letting the younger men mingle with them. As I said, I yield to no man or no woman in this House in my love and veneration for that referee, the Supreme Court. Our former President, Theodore Roosevelt, would have brought their decisions into this House to have them reviewed. I am against that. I think every man and every woman here is against it, yet a great popular acclaim went up for that program of Mr. Theodore Roosevelt.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCSWEENEY. Certainly.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it the gentleman's thought that when the referee's decision is not in accordance with what we would like we should have the privilege of placing some more referees in the game?

Mr. MCSWEENEY. Not at that time.

Mr. KNUTSON. I would like to ask the gentleman one more question. If what the gentleman says is true about getting out and finding out who has got the ball, and all this and that, that could be solved by making the Justices of the Supreme Court elective.

Mr. MCSWEENEY. I do not approve of that. I think that they then could not sit as impartial referees if they were subject to the personal whims of the public with regard to court decisions.

Mr. KNUTSON. That is what they are trying to do now—bend the Supreme Court to the personal whim of the administration.

Mr. MCSWEENEY. I consider the Supreme Court a referee. Again speaking the universal language of sports, do we not know that at the close of each baseball or football season certain representatives of those sports get together, and what do they do? They try to take out of football some of the things that have been detrimental to health and happiness in that game in the previous season.

In baseball, if they find some fault, they try to take that fault out of the game for the next season. The American people have sent you and me here as Representatives of our various districts. You and I have a right to change the rules. We are not changing the umpire in the middle of the game. We are changing the rules so that the umpire can adjust the new set of rules to the new and changing conditions in America. [Applause.]

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCSWEENEY. Certainly.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The last statement of the gentleman would be true, would it not, and only true, if we changed the Constitution in accordance with the method that is therein provided?

Mr. MCSWEENEY. There is nothing in the Constitution that requires that in any way. There are only two original jurisdictions given to the Court by the Constitution. The rest are given by us, the Congress. Congress has given all the other jurisdictions except those affecting ambassadors and matters affecting our States. These jurisdictions have been granted by us, and we should have a right to change them.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCSWEENEY. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. May I ask the gentleman a very frank question?

Mr. MCSWEENEY. Certainly.

Mr. MOTT. Is not the gentleman's reason for desiring this change proposed by the President so that we may get immediately a court which will hold to be constitutional that legislation enacted within the last 4 years which has been held to be unconstitutional? Is not that the gentleman's frank desire?

Mr. MCSWEENEY. I will state frankly what I am thinking about. I have seen from the present tenor of the Court that it is against all things, such as minimum wages and maximum hours. I am deeply interested in old-age pensions. I feel that with the present trend of mind of the Supreme Court, there would be no chance of getting that kind of humanitarian legislation passed. I am not in favor of in any way trying to ram down their throats what they should do; but at the same time I think you and I have a right to change the rules and have a right to say "These are the rules. If you want to umpire the game, be guided by these rules." That is our authority, and that is our right as a Congress.

Mr. MOTT. Just a moment. The gentleman, I take it from what he has just said, would now answer the question I first asked by saying "yes", would he not?

Mr. McSWEENEY. No; I cannot unqualifiedly say "yes."

Mr. MOTT. Then, I did not understand the gentleman's argument.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWEENEY. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. Does not the gentleman understand that the rule is the Constitution itself?

Mr. McSWEENEY. Not at all. I differ with the gentleman on that, and I ask any constitutional lawyer here if I am not right. I used to be a friend of Henry St. George Tucker, a great constitutional lawyer, and learned from him the rights of the Congress under the Constitution.

Mr. CHURCH. The gentleman just said that he reserved the right to change the rules.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Yes; and I ask any Member here if the right to change the rules is not given us by the Constitution?

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWEENEY. I yield gladly.

Mr. MAVERICK. I want to note that the gentlemen who are asking all these questions are Republicans—and it is their right. They talk of rubber stamps, but if there are such things, they are rubber stamps of another kind. They are against anything the President proposes. Permit me, however, to make the observation that if what we are doing is unconstitutional and they object to it, they can get a constitutional amendment. No constitutional amendment is necessary, for what we are doing is absolutely constitutional, is it not?

Mr. McSWEENEY. Yes. I would ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK], and the other Members, if they do not agree that it is much better to carry out the constitutional mandate which says that you and I shall go back to our people every 2 years for reelection. If you and I have done something contrary to their wishes we at least have not in any way dragged the Constitution down to the level of a statute book. We voted our convictions. If we have not changed this program they, the people, have the legal right to send back men and women who will change it. It is less important that we be defeated than that we vote to ruin the Constitution.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. McSWEENEY. I yield.

Mr. MAVERICK. Is it not a fact that according to Associate Justice Stone of the United States Supreme Court—and he said it himself—the other members of the Court were guilty of basing their opinions on their economic prejudices? Does the gentleman think that any direct inhibition of the Constitution would be violated by men appointed by Mr. Roosevelt? For instance, is there any likelihood of our establishing a church supported by taxation? Is there any likelihood of our violating the freedom of speech and the press and individual liberty? Has the gentleman anything like that in mind?

Mr. McSWEENEY. Not at all; and I have every confidence that any man or woman appointed to this Court will be a fine, sensible, patriotic American, capable of exercising unprejudiced judgment on constitutional matters.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWEENEY. I yield gladly. I am glad to see so much interest in this great question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] asked a question about reactionaries. It was my understanding of the gentleman's reply that the seven Republicans on the bench as now constituted are conducting a sit-down strike against humanitarian legislation. We just want to break that strike.

Mr. McSWEENEY. I would not have the gentleman infer from any remark of mine that I reflected in any way on the present members of that Court.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. If it is unconstitutional to put anyone but a Republican on that bench, then, of course, this is bad legislation.

Mr. McSWEENEY. I would not have my colleague infer from anything I have said that I am casting any reflection whatever upon the splendid service of these men. It is but natural that legal talent can be employed only by people who have money, and I notice that most of this legal talent represents big corporate interests. [Applause.]

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWEENEY. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. A moment ago the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK] interrogating the gentleman from Ohio rather inferred that this was a party issue. He said something to the effect that all the Republicans were against it and all the Democrats were for it.

Mr. MAVERICK. No; I did not say that the Democrats were all for it; I did not say that. I said all the Republicans are against; so are some of the Democrats.

Mr. MOTT. That was the inference I received from the remarks of the gentleman.

Mr. McSWEENEY. I am not inferring that.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman does not concur in that view, does he?

Mr. McSWEENEY. No. I said I did not want my speech to be interpreted as an accusation of these gentlemen. I am merely saying that from their age, their background, all those things taken into consideration, that this proposal to have younger men sit with them is good. We have a very good example in the Senate. The Senate is never entirely new, and I think we are all agreed it is a good thing that it is not. But I think we are agreed, too, that it is a splendid thing to have new blood, young blood, infiltrated into that body. There should be a mixture of youth and age rather than a body composed entirely of young men, or rather a body of men who are said to be incapable when they reach the age of 70.

Mr. MOTT. My question was directed to the party feature. I consider this to be about the most nonpartisan issue that has ever been presented to the American people, and I trust the gentleman concurs in that statement.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWEENEY. I yield to my comrade the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. The opponents of this proposal keep talking about a constitutional amendment. Of course, anyone who is familiar with the law and the Constitution knows that this may be done without a constitutional amendment. They are telling the country of the direful consequences that would ensue from increasing the membership of the Supreme Court at this time. Would the gentleman call attention to the fact that during Grant's administration the membership of the Court was increased in the same way? This was during a Republican administration, and it did not wreck the country, but, on the contrary, possibly saved our financial system at that time.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Does the gentleman realize that during the Johnson administration the membership was reduced?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; they had an honest man in the White House at that time. May I say the Republicans had a man in the White House they could not browbeat, intimidate, or corrupt—Andrew Johnson. They were so afraid the Supreme Court would side with him in undoing a lot of pernicious, criminal acts that were being passed by Congress, they even reduced the membership of the Supreme Court from nine to seven to keep him from appointing men on the Court who would uphold the Constitution of the United States. This is no innovation by any means.

Mr. MOTT. I wonder if the gentleman thinks that is right?

Mr. RANKIN. The Republican Party thought so at that time.

Mr. McSWEENEY. May I answer the gentleman by saying a former Governor of Maine said Sunday night at the Town Hall meeting that this is the first time there has been an open declaration on the part of a President to do something about the judiciary. I would rather have it openly and courageously done than to have it done by subterfuge. I am one of those who believes that the President should take his stand openly and courageously and not by innuendo or subterfuge, do it as has been done in the past, and I am not making a political accusation.

Mr. MOTT. I admire the gentleman's attitude in stating why he wants the change made. I only wish the other advocates of this proposal were as frank as he has been.

Mr. McSWEENEY. May I ask the gentleman this question: Is he definitely in favor of cutting a man from his service with the Government because he is 70 years of age?

Mr. MOTT. No. I am not in favor of any part of the President's proposal so far as it has to do with the Supreme Court.

Mr. McSWEENEY. I want to thank the Speaker and the Members of the House for their courteous consideration of my views on President Roosevelt's proposal.

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

THE NATURE AND PROPERTIES OF ELECTRICITY

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, electricity as a vital necessity is fast coming into general use and universal application in the everyday affairs of life, and its forces in operation are alike coming to be directed and applied by women, children, and the inexperienced as well as the professional and electrical experts and those skilled in the science.

Not only for security in operating electrical facilities and to safeguard against accidents attending its use and operations, but for the more efficient application of its powers, energies, and forces, a general and better knowledge is becoming imperative with its wider use.

To this end I am speaking for publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as well as for the proper information of Members of the House of Representatives active here in promoting an electrical system to carry electricity to all the people, to the rural population as well as to city consumers.

I do not assume any expert or technical knowledge of the nature, laws, or principles of electricity. I have never taken a course of study in electricity, nor have I ever especially devoted myself to the subject to master this very intricate and mysterious science. I have and possess only a general knowledge gained from promiscuous and incidental reading.

I am talking on electricity as a science only to explain its general movements, the lines, courses, or pathways it follows, in the hope that I may contribute something to a better understanding of its powers by the people of the country generally in its use in their homes and their everyday business affairs.

For long centuries of time, man has groped his way through the wilderness of the world, unawares, unmindful of the existence of the great forces of nature or the means of their direction and control.

One of these great natural powers, now more known and understood by man, is the mysterious force of electricity, working wonders in the economic world, lifting burdens, relieving from irksome drudgeries, dispelling the shadows of darkness, and bringing comfort, convenience, and cheer to man.

But we are still today unconscious of many of the greatest powers of electricity lying dormant, concealed about us, which will some day be revealed to man, developed, and harnessed for control and made to do even greater service than electricity is performing for man today.

Electricity is not only contained in all matters and every substance as air, water, stone, and metal, but it is a part of all matter and every material substance.

It is a theory of electricity that all matter is made up of small particles called molecules, which are combinations of atoms, and the atoms are in turn made up of smaller or more minute particles called electrons and protons.

Electricity may be called the force in matter, known as attraction of gravitation, holding these minute particles of matter in form, as bodies adhering together, and, in theory, revolving one around the other like the forces of Sir Isaac Newton's law, holding or suspending the planets in space.

It is the theory of matter that each atom has its own electric system, like each animal or plant life cell has its own nervous or mental system. The system comprised of electrons and protons with its positive and negative forces operates by currents and magnetism.

It is a law of physical science that no particles of matter can be destroyed; that its form only can be changed. We cannot destroy a piece of glass. We can only change its form by breaking it into smaller portions or by melting and molding it again.

Nothing in existence can be destroyed and nothing not in existence can be created. This is expressed in the old saying: "There is nothing new under the sun." We must accept the earth as we find it; we can neither add to nor take from.

The amount of matter in the world is fixed and certain in amount which cannot vary a single atom. Electricity, as a part of matter, is alike, in amount, fixed and certain which can neither be increased nor decreased.

We speak of generating electricity or developing or creating electricity. But an electric power generator can no more generate or create electricity than a pump creates water. The generator only accumulates electricity, brings it into a current exerting force, like the pump forces a stream of water.

But it is possible to change the proportions of the different forms of matter, or the different elements entering into matter, as to accumulate more water or other matter, as iron, stone, or other material in one location. But this accumulation can only be maintained temporarily for the time being.

And it is likewise possible by chemical action, friction or otherwise, to change the natural normal proportions of the minute structure of material and create a new form of matter.

Too many so-called electrons in the atom in proportion to the so-called proton elements creates a disequilibrium or unbalanced state and will start an electrical current outward and too small a number of electrons will start an opposite force and a negative current inward.

And it is also a law of physical science that matter thrown out or off of its equilibrium will adjust itself to a balanced state, like when water is thrown off or out of its general balanced level. No matter whether by natural or artificial causes, a motion sets in to restore its balance or water level.

This motion of water seeking its level, following in the course of natural law, exerts the force which man has harnessed to turn the water wheel of the mill which is carried to pulleys, shafts, and machinery, to perform man's task and lift his burdens.

This is the force exerted from a stream of water seeking an equilibrium or its balanced level under the natural law of gravitation of attraction, whether carried, lifted in the form of clouds and precipitated as rainfall upon the earth, or carried and held by man through canals and pipes to fall from a higher to a lower level.

This is true of all forms or elements of matter thrown out of a natural balanced state, such as the unequal heating of the air at one location in the atmosphere, whether caused by the sun's rays or by artificial means by man, a current of air will set in to restore an even temperature or balanced state.

Air, the ocean of atmosphere, surrounding and enveloping the earth, exerts no energy in its even balance, but when unevenly heated and thrown out of its natural balance, currents to restore its equilibrium set in in the form of storms, gales, and cyclones and sweep into devastating and destructive power.

This movement to restore a natural equilibrium from an unequal balance of the atmosphere is the force that causes the winds to blow, which power man has harnessed by the invention of the windmill and the sails spread on the ships for his navigation of the seas.

Now, we come to another element and another form of matter, or element of matter, as common as water, air, or earth, which has come to be called electricity, the derivation or history of which term will not be necessary or possible to give here.

Electricity, like other forms or elements of matter, can neither be created, destroyed, nor consumed. It can only be increased or decreased in matter at a certain given place or location. Its amount in the material world is fixed as certain as other parts of creation.

Electricity can only be generated, accumulated, in greater or more unequal portion in a body of matter than when resting in its balanced state or reposing in natural equilibrium or balance. And, like water or other elements, when thrown into such unequal balance a current sets in to restore an equilibrium and, like water and air, exerts a force which man has harnessed for power as man has harnessed other currents and movements resulting from the disequilibrium of other forms or elements of matter.

Scientists tell us that electricity includes both positive and negative forces which they call the protons, or positive charge, and which remain permanent in the atom, and the electrons, or the negative charge, which is free to move around and about within and out and from and a part of the atom.

When the electron and proton elements of electricity, the negative and positive forces of the atom, remain in even or a balanced proportion, which is called static, or electricity at rest, electricity is in a natural or normal state, but when the electrons are in excess of protons, a current sets in and electricity is in motion.

If, by any natural or artificial means, more electricity is generated in a body of matter than exists in its normal state, or in excess, unequal proportions, there is a positive, or overcharge, and electricity in a current flows out to balance its relative forces.

Regardless of how electricity be thrown out of balance, whether by natural or artificial causes, whether by friction of clouds on the air, causing currents called lightning, or whether by motions of dynamos accumulating electricity in unequal balance, the same equalizing current sets in.

Lightning results from an unequal charge of electricity moving in the atmosphere, either moving from clouds to clouds or, when the air becomes moist, from vapor or falling rain, and forming a conductor or pathway, striking down and reaching the earth to equalize its balance between earth and clouds.

Lightning and electricity are one and the same force, moving and exerting itself in a current. The reason why man has not harnessed lightning the same as electricity is because of its changing frequency and uncertainty for dependability, for reliance in economic, industrial affairs and not because of its different nature.

And regardless of the cause or whether matter in motion is thrown off its even-balanced state or equilibrium by natural or artificial forces, the movements are the same to recover back an even balance and the same force and power is exerted.

A disturbance of the even balance of water by the application of heat to change its form and natural state and its movement to expand, throwing off the heat and assuming its natural form, it exerts a terrific force which man has harnessed by the invention of the many forms of the steam engine.

Unlike the force of air and water, moving to restore an even balance or level, electricity moves only in a circuit. The circuit must be continuous and uninterrupted back to the source of the electric current, either through and by means of a return wire or grounded and returned through the earth.

If the current, by faulty insulation or otherwise, is brought in touch with the return wire or earth before it reaches the place or location where its power is to be applied and used, in the language of the electric street it is "shorted" or called a "short circuit", and returns before reaching its destination where its force was intended to be exerted.

If the wire carrying electricity outward is left without a circuit or ground wire, and the end of the wire is left to terminate in the dry air, which is a nonconductor of electricity, the flow of electricity will be stopped, like the water in a plugged pipe.

Electricity is without force or power in its even or balanced state, existing in the air, water, and all material. But under the friction of the clouds passing and sweeping through the air currents, electricity is brought to existence and realization through its uneven or unbalanced proportion of elements.

And a current of electricity, like a current of water flowing, sets in to equalize its force and exerts a current of power, which current men have learned to conduct, direct, and harness for many uses and purposes.

For analysis, study, and application, scientists have divided electricity into different movements and forms, among which the most common are static electricity, current electricity, and positive electricity and negative electricity.

Static electricity is electricity at rest. Its body or force is in a state of balance, in which state it exerts no power or force. Current electricity is electricity in motion, electricity moving to restore its equilibrium and in which state it exerts an active force.

At first impression electricity appears to be a more complex and mysterious agency than other forces, powers, and energies. But, in fact, it is not more mysterious than other parts of the world around us. It is not more mysterious than light, than the movements of water in different forms, than the elements of water and air, or the minute atoms of the molecules, the component parts of all matter.

It is not more mysterious or incomprehensible than animal and plant life about us, the cause for which we cannot explain, nor more mysterious than any other matter, not more mysterious than the immensity of space extending far away in the heavens above and before us, a distance beyond the power and strength of the human mind to follow.

Scientists have analyzed water and tell us of its component parts of oxygen and hydrogen in unequal proportions, and then going into these gases to explain and describe their nature they get into still deeper water and come back to shore to live with others in awe and mystery of matter.

Men talk very wise, learned, and knowing about the elements, the component parts about the molecules made up of atoms, about the atoms with their electrons and protons, but when they try to carry their explanation further they find themselves lost in mystery, and are left wondering and groping in the midst of bewilderment.

Very little more is known today about the real nature and properties of electricity than was known in Ben Franklin's time, when he brought down electricity from a kite through a silken cord to the ground. Men have only learned more of how electricity operates and exerts its force.

We only know more about what electricity does. We only know how it can be harnessed. We only know more how it can be generated or accumulated. We only know more how it can be carried and directed, how its force can be exerted in power to work and perform useful services for man.

We stand in bewildering mystery with all around and about us. We do not know where we are. We do not know what we are. We do not know for what we are. We do not know from whence we came. We do not know to whither we go. We do not know. We only hope and strive to know.

In our helpless failure of comprehension we appeal to a higher power, in the forms of faith and religion, for guidance, direction, and understanding, and then we withdraw from the problem as beyond the mind of man and leave all without solution.

ELECTRICITY AND HOW WE HEAR BY RADIO

The earth is encompassed by great oceans of water, and if the surface was perfectly level, our world would be completely enveloped by a watery waste submerging all land. Then the earth is further surrounded by another and deeper ocean, an ocean of air, the atmosphere, extending out, around, and up for many miles.

And we are still further surrounded by another ocean yet deeper and broader, and extending in theory out even to the stars, and permeating and filling all space, which, for want of a better name, is known in science as ether.

We can both see and feel the currents of air and see objects yielding to its force, and when it moves we say the wind blows, but we are not conscious of the ether ocean because we can neither see nor feel it; only scientists know of its existence.

The two great oceans of air and ether exist together or occupy the same space, like almost a full bucket of water can be poured into a full bucket of sand, the water filling up and occupying the empty spaces left existing between the grains of sand.

There is no void or empty space either here in the world where we live or between here and the stars and other worlds. All is filled with some medium, which only scientists know exists, and upon which and through this medium come the wave vibrations of light from the far distant stars.

The wind and great ships passing set the water in wave motion and certain natural and artificial forces operating set the air and atmosphere in like motion, but the medium of water and air are too dense and heavy to carry the high frequency rapid waves long and far away distances.

If the sound waves in the ether were visible, could be observed by the eye, the same as water waves can be seen and observed, we would see the sound waves going out in every direction from the broadcasting station.

Electricity is a force, power, or energy moving or projecting movement in the form of waves the same as light, heat, and sound, the same as movements of water, in undulating and alternating wave movements, while the body of water itself is not moving forward or advancing.

Watch a piece of wood floating upon the water, and while the wood will be seen to rise and fall with the repeating waves, its position in the water will not be changed or the wood carried forward by the apparent motion of the water.

What is true of water waves is true of the waves of air and the waves of the medium called ether. As the waves are in a separate movement passing through and upon the water, so are air and ether waves a movement, passing upon and through the air and ether.

Water waves may be set in motion either by natural or artificial forces, either by the force of attraction or by the force of gravitation or the force of mechanical pumps, but whether the force be natural or artificial the result will be the same, only the artificial are the more costly.

And likewise electric waves may be set in motion either by natural or artificial means, either by the friction of the clouds on the air, generating natural electricity or lightning, or by motion created by dynamos generating and accumulating artificial electricity, and the results will not be different.

A stream of projecting light and a stream of electrical vibrations move and operate very similarly and are the same. Both travel at 186,000 miles a second, both in the form of motion in waves.

Electric waves are carried and pass through certain objects and materials called conductors, but will be stopped by other materials which are called nonconductors, such as slate, glass, and porcelain, used to hold wires suspended from the ground, and to prevent the electricity from passing to the poles.

The sound waves carrying the voice by radio or motion current through the ether are not different from the sound waves carrying the voice by telephone through wires. By telephone the sound motion waves are carried through wires to a certain direction, by radio they are broadcast in every direction.

To illustrate, stand on the bank of a pond and throw a stone in the center of the pond and the water waves will go out from the center in every direction until they extend over the whole pond. This is how radio sound waves go out in all directions from the broadcasting stations.

Electric currents may be carried in waves, either through wires as conductors or through a fluid, gas, or the medium permeating all space that is called ether. The difference is that telephone wires carry sound waves with less power and frequency than is required through ether carrying radio waves.

Light waves travel through ether. Common or natural sound waves are carried by the air, the atmosphere, and move more slowly and fade away before continuing a long distance. The light waves moving in the ether travel more rapidly than air waves and continue farther or go on forever.

There is a very noticeable difference between the speed of the ether-wave motions and the common or air-wave vibrations which carry sound by wave motion.

We see the stroke or motion of the ax of the woodchopper at a distance, coming to us on the ether light waves, almost instantly as the stroke is made. But we must pause and wait to hear the sound of the belated ax stroke which comes to us on the slower air waves, held back by the more dense and heavy atmosphere.

We see the flash of the lightning before we hear the peal of thunder because the light comes to us on the ether waves and the sound of the thunder on the waves of air. Lightning, natural electricity, sets in motion the waves or vibrations of the ether.

But it is the crash of the displaced air to fill the vacuum caused or created by the striking current of electricity which sets the air in wave or vibration motion and which travels more slowly than the ether waves, and we wait to hear the thunder.

The waves of ether set in motion by radio-broadcasting devices are too high and rapid to be detected by the natural ear, loud speaker, or telephone. But the more delicate radio-receiver adjustments may be set to detect the different wave frequencies and reproduce them in sound from different stations.

Your radio receiving set is a sensitive artificial ear, constructed to detect or respond to sound waves which the natural ear is unable to detect and, of course, fails to take notice and to transform and amplify such radio sound waves into sound waves receptive by the natural ear.

The natural ear is constructed and provided to enable men and the animal creation to converse or communicate with their species, and to take warning of approaching enemies for their defense and self-preservation. But none of which objects or purposes are required served from far away, long distances.

The radio broadcasting programs of instrumental music and the human voice are carried to the radio audience by the combined electrical devices of the sound wave projecting facilities of the broadcasting station and the radio receiving sets.

The broadcasting electrical devices first throw the ether wave in motion and project the vibrations out through space. But without the radio receiving set, with electricity to wait and listen, to detect or take cognizance of the ether vibrations, and to transform the ether waves projected into sound waves for the natural ear, which are the same as telephone waves, all would remain as still and silent and as painfully oppressive as the solitude of the desert.

Common or natural sounds are carried by air waves or vibrations, and in such waves or vibrations sounds are heard by the natural ear but the artificial radio broadcasting devices, by using the greater force of electricity, send out sounds on a different roadway.

Instead of sending out waves or vibrations which travel slowly and short distances, the sounds are sent out and started on their way on the rapid ether wave or vibration route on the same waves that carry light and which travel 186,000 miles a second or almost eight times around the world.

But the ether-wave travel route way has no natural station or terminal facilities or no natural ear to listen and take notice and to provide an ether-wave station, and the radio-receiving set was invented to serve as an artificial ear to record or take notice of what the natural ear fails to detect or observe.

This broadcasting station sends out through the ether, the sound wave set in motion by the voice of the speaker or singer which is carried by high-frequency electric currents out in every direction from the power station, and your radio-receiving set in your home detects the electric waves in the ether and transmits and reproduces them into sound waves for the natural ear.

And the ether waves are caught up and carried by high-frequency electric currents, traveling at the rate of 186,000 miles a second, as rapid as if borne by the wings of light, and the voice of the radio speaker is heard as at the very instant he speaks, across continents or around the world.

The voice of the speaker or singer is carried from the radio studio to far-away homes of the listeners like a distant friend or visitor coming to them by different modes of travel, as by railway, airship, plane, or automobile.

First the vocal cords of the speaker or singer set the air in sound wave motion and carry the voice to the microphone. The microphone in the radio studio receives and records the air vibrations. This is the first sound wave station on the journey of the voice of the speaker or singer from the radio station to the listener's home.

The microphone transforms the air waves into what might be called telephone sound vibrations, traveling through the wire from the microphone to the broadcasting devices at the high towers. The broadcasting electrical devices are the second sound wave station on the route by which the voice travels to reach the listeners.

There the electrical broadcasting devices transform the telephone sound waves into high-frequency ether waves, the same waves which carry light and traveling at 186,000 miles a second, or a distance of over eight times around the earth in that brief period of time.

These high-frequency ether sound waves, set in motion by the broadcasting devices, are received and recorded by the radio receiving set. The radio receiving set in our homes then transforms these ether high-frequency waves back into the common sound air waves, of which the natural ear takes notice.

There at this third station on the journey of the voice from radio studio to our homes, the high-frequency ether waves are transformed back into common sound air waves by setting the air in vibration motion, to be received and recorded by the natural ear, and this is the end of the journey where we listen and hear the radio program.

THE DEVELOPMENT AND PRACTICAL USE OF ELECTRICITY

It was many long years after the force and power of electricity was revealed and understood by man that electricity was brought to use and to practical application in the every-day affairs of life.

The progress and developments made to bring electricity within the control of man for use and to lift and carry his burdens has been at the price and sacrifice of long years of tedious study, of repeated experiments, trial and retrial, failures and discouragements over and over again, a recital of which is impossible here.

Many of the pioneers in the development of electricity have exhausted their means and fortunes, sacrificed a life-time in strenuous toil and labor only to lay the foundation and basis for great electrical inventions and discoveries and the glory of which to be taken by those coming more leisurely after them.

Benjamin Franklin, by his experiments, bringing electricity down from the clouds, added to the store of scientific knowledge of the nature and properties of electricity, and proved conclusively that lightning, developed by the forces of nature, and electricity, developed by artificial means, were one and the same force or energy.

But Franklin did not complete any inventions for the practical application of electricity and its use in the every-day affairs of life. What Franklin did was more to arouse and stimulate a greater interest in electricity as a science and a more intense study of its latent powers.

It was Samuel F. B. Morse, in 1843, by his invention of the telegraph, who first brought electricity into the limelight before the world, and demonstrated its commercial use and laid the foundation for a system of rapid communication and transmission of messages.

Morse's invention was so unusual and mysterious and contrary to all human experience that it was at first regarded as a trick, a jugglery performed by a magician, and was accepted by the people with doubt, apprehension, and distrust or as too incredible for belief.

But telegraphy was a reality overcoming both time and space, revolutionizing communication service, bringing the people of continents nearer to each other in commercial relations and finally making the whole civilized world, by the ocean cable, a borderland community.

Then came Alexander Graham Bell and Elisha Gray, only 2 hours apart, on February 14, 1876, to apply for a patent on the telephone for the transmission of the actual voice sound under a claim for long-distance speaking.

This was even more bewildering than the telegraph, and the people curiously looked on very much like the dog in the picture looking into the phonograph amplifier and listening to "His Master's Voice."

This invention laid the foundation for a system of voice communication which has been developed and carried out through a system of poles and wires, reaching across wide continents, ramifying to every town, village, and city, and finally going out to the rural homes for communication with nearby neighbors, or to converse with friends or on business, with citizens in far-away States.

Then came Michael Faraday, first in 1831 and continuously through his life, with his experiments and discoveries, developing the power to generate electricity and to accumulate and hold its force in storage in active form, for relief and use at will.

But the inventions and discoveries of Faraday not only brought the power to generate electricity, but indirectly he invented the means of power from electricity, which, by reversing the operations of the dynamo, he developed the electric motor whereby to use the power generated in one place, in many other and far distant places.

The discoveries of Michael Faraday demonstrated the relation of electric force with other forms of natural force and power; and proved that one natural force can be transformed into another, and then brought back again into the form in which it originally came.

The latent heat in coal, under the chemical action of fire, may be transformed into steam power and the power exerted by the force of steam, may be transformed into electricity by the dynamo, and then the electric force thereby created may be transformed back again into heat.

In other words, the great forces of nature are interchangeable, one into another, or transformed from one form into another and finally back into the first force exerted.

While we may never be able to solve the mysteries of electricity more than we have been able to solve the mysteries of other parts of creation, the mysteries of time and space, yet the study of the science of electricity will always remain as interesting and fascinating as the study of astronomy and the heavens, and the mystery of the far-away stars in space.

Then came Prof. W. C. Roentgen with his discovery of the X-rays to penetrate and picture concealed objects, even to pierce the bones and flesh tissues and reveal the condition of the organs of the body, and making the practice of surgery and medicine an open, a more certain, and effective art.

This with other inventions and discoveries has brought the application of electricity before the world as a vital factor in the treatment of the body, not only in the practice of surgery but in the application of electric vibrations for the eradication of certain ailments and the modification of other bodily impairments.

The discovery of the X-rays marked a new and forward step in surgery and the treatment of the body, in arresting, staying, and overcoming disease, and with which to throw the searchlight into the bones and flesh tissues, for the discovery of diseased organs and disorders concealed and veiled in the darkness for operation and treatment in the open light.

But it was reserved for Thomas A. Edison to invent, develop, and perfect the incandescent electric lamp, to make the days longer for pleasure and useful occupation and to carry the day into the nighttime for greater happiness and enjoyment of life.

While the invention of the electric light was not of greater economic use and advantage than the invention of the dynamo and electric motor, coming to propel the great wheels and pulleys of the ponderous automatic machines, revolutionizing industrial production, yet the incandescent lamp, by its spectacular dazzle of the eye, brought electricity to the notice and attention of every man, woman, and child and has done more to popularize electricity than all other electrical devices invented.

Edison's invention of the incandescent lamp has illuminated every town and city with a brilliant and dazzling display of light, with changing and alternating hues and tints, gorgeous, bewildering, and beautiful to behold, a veritable paradise of decoration, with varying colors rivaled only by the sunset skies.

Seeing is the most vital of all faculties of all the senses guiding and directing man groping his way through the wilderness of the world. We may listen to sounds or a voice coming to us but we are not certain of which or from whom. We may touch or smell a substance or some form of matter but we are not positive of its source or nature or the form or properties of the object before us.

We must wait for the sense of vision until we can see and be positively assured, before we are ready to determine and take action to meet the object or condition confronting us. Seeing is believing, and then we know.

The glory and majesty of creation is but partially and faintly revealed to man through the other senses with which men are endowed. It is through the natural sense of vision that revelation is made full and complete by viewing the mountains, valleys, and streams, beholding the firmament of the heavens, the star-decked canopy of the nighttime.

It was this appeal to vision, the natural sense of sight, that brought Edison into the limelight and will keep his invention in the limelight when other equally famous inventors and other equally meritorious inventions will be overlooked and lost sight of.

But it is the electric light and motor, invented by Edison and Faraday, which have given electricity an overshadowing place in industry and made it the greatest factor, and of the most substantial and economic value in the conduct of commerce, industry, and trade.

THE RESOURCES AND SUPPLY OF ELECTRICITY

Inventions, discoveries, and developments have brought to us a realization that we are in an ocean of electricity as broad as the earth around us, as deep as the atmosphere above us, and as plentiful as air, water, and sunlight; that this unseen force and energy permeates and fills all space above the earth as well as below its surface, and in time can be made available for use and enjoyment of the people as free and at a cost as reasonable as pumping and distributing water.

Of all the inventions and discoveries developing power and harnessing the forces of nature to serve the use and purpose of men, none or any or all combines have exerted such far-reaching influence upon civilization and human progress as has the use and application of electricity.

And it is a remarkable coincidence in the progress and development of electricity that as its many growing uses were realized new inventions and discoveries were coming to multiply the production of electricity, and even at lower and more trivial costs, and to keep pace with the increased demand.

The great forces of nature are found to be interchangeable. One form of power may be transformed from one form and exerted in another, like the latent power of heat in coal and oils which may be transferred into steam, and the power of steam transformed into electric power.

And as it is with the power of coal and oil and the power exerted from confined steam, so it is with the powers of air currents, and the power exerted from falling water which may be transformed and be exerted in the form of electric power energy.

By science, discovery, and invention these great latent powers of the elements, the falling waters of the streams, the ebb and flow of the resistless tide, the electric forces from the air, the pent-up oils and gases, struggling for release, held in the bowels of the earth, and transformed into electrical force, can all be harnessed and controlled for the use and service of man and can be transported for distribution and apportioned to and among all the people by a network of lines and conduits carrying these powers and energies many hundreds of miles, far distant, from the place or location of their development.

And all these services can be provided to lessen and lighten the burdens of the daily tasks of the people and to make the days longer for pleasure and useful occupation, and to carry the day into the nighttime for greater happiness and enjoyment of life.

The great destruction of the 1936–37 floodwaters has brought an impressive object lesson before the Nation and the people of the country, and as the raging torrents of water recede in the wake of death and chaos the people are brought to meditation and reflection upon means to insure against a repetition.

The power of floodwaters, if held back and harnessed, would exert a force of incalculable magnitude, and when in the form of electricity could be transmitted and distributed to every part and section of the country, to every village, town, and city in the land, and to every home, factory, mill, and workshop.

If the great powers and forces of these raging torrents of disaster, carrying a tide of chaos and death, were restrained, conserved, and held, they could be made ready and available to man as the resources of nature and converted and transformed for use of all the people into electrical energy and power under utility grants and concessions, free from monopoly and private control.

These great rivers and streams of water can now be improved for flood control under one unified system not only to safeguard against floods but for inland-water navigation, for the irrigation of arid lands, or reserve waters to meet drought disasters, for the prevention of stream pollution, and to conserve water supplies for the use of great cities, and to safeguard against soil erosion.

And while serving all these uses and purposes, the waters of these destructive rivers and streams can be held in control for use to provide electric power and force sufficient for all the people of the land, and current sold at low and reasonable rates, and from which source of income the cost of all improvements can be made.

While all these great powers and forces of the floodwaters passing in torrents are running to waste, loss, and dissipation, and these unrestrained currents are reeking havoc and destruction to millions in property values and appalling loss of human life, millions of acres are left fruitless for want of irrigating waters and other land from devastating drought emergencies, inland navigation is left to languish, rivers and streams are left foul and polluted, unfit and unavailable for water supplies for dependent and populous cities.

But these many valuable uses served are not all the benefits and advantages which can be gained by flood control. Billions of value in water power are lost and go to absolute waste from the passing of these destructive floods.

In control of these rivers and streams to safeguard against flood disasters, advantage can be taken of the conserved waters to use the power not only continuing throughout the dry or drought seasons but to use their powers over and over again in certain mile intervals from source to mouth.

Advantage can be taken in flood prevention by the construction of dams and great reservoirs constructed at the valleys of intersecting tributaries to hold the water back in great basins from the mad onrushing torrents for deliberate and gradual relief for the development of power as needed to perform the arduous tasks of men.

And while these destructive waters are controlled to safeguard against flood disaster, by the same control of the waters their forces may be made to work for man and their services made of equal value to the cost of their subjugation and control.

The great Father of Waters, the Mississippi River, and its tributaries flowing inward from the lofty Rocky Mountains and the great western plains and divide, and from the Appalachian Mountain system, looking, facing, sloping westward, together with the streams flowing direct to the Pacific and the waters draining direct to the Atlantic Ocean, can all be harnessed and used for power and dams and power sites constructed at certain mile intervals as the water falls from the source to the mouth of these streams, and while passing the power reproduced and multiplied many hundredfold over and over again.

From these great powers and forces, from these falling waters of the rivers and streams electric current can be produced or generated to light every highway and country road, every street, alley, and park space and every public hall in every town and city in the land.

When these great sources are developed, electricity can be produced or generated to furnish light, heat, and power to every farm and urban home for light and power and to carry on farm agricultural operations for 6,000,000 farmers of the country, and at a cost so low and trivial to make electricity within the reach of every family the same as the rural mails and the parcel post.

The conservation of these great natural resources, the weight of falling waters held and everywhere made available for the generation of electric power will make every rippling river and murmuring stream, every onward flowing current and rushing mountain torrent, every swelling tide, flowing and ebbing from the sea, a force, a factor in the exertion of electrical power, to work and serve the wants and needs, the convenience, happiness, and welfare contributing to the enjoyment of men, and to make the earth a Canaan of plenty and great abundance, a veritable paradise of dazzling glory, of light, colors, and illumination as well as for power and for useful service.

But under more modern invention and discoveries these great powers to generate electricity are no longer confined to falling waters but have been doubled and multiplied by the invention of the Diesel engine and other forms of power generated.

And under these new inventions and discoveries, with cooperative or public ownership operation, electricity can be generated at the same low cost, regardless of whether by water-power facilities or other natural sources of power exertion. And such power can be duplicated at any point or locality in the country and at a cost even as low as by the falling waters of the stream and current carried long distances for use.

The following is from the second report of the Science Advisory Board, page 19, as well as further shown in the hearings on Senate bill 3524, this last Congress, part 1, at page 236 thereof:

> As a result of the recent great improvements in furnaces and engines (for the generation of electricity) under the present low prices for fuels and the possibility of building fuel electric plants near the market (where mined or produced), and where fuel can be delivered cheaply, it is commonly less costly to provide electricity by combustion methods than by harnessing water power and building (long) transmission lines.

And now the marvel of the force of the Diesel engine to exert power is to be in turn outrivaled by high-pressure steam engines which are now being designed and built to multiply power manyfold and times over electricity from burning fuels, coal, and oil.

With the natural power of falling water exerted from the running streams and converted or transformed into electricity, and all carried and distributed to every farm home and hamlet in the land, and with the discovery that power, whether exerted from burning coal or whether through means of steam or from the weight and movement of running water, may be converted into electric force, making the sources and supply of electricity unlimited or inexhaustible for use, the rural population can be furnished and enjoy the same service for the convenience and comfort as the people living in the towns and cities and at a cost low and reasonable and within the reach of every farmer.

And every farm home, barn, and garage, and every country home, walk, and driveway can be lighted every hour of the night at a rate so low and comparatively trivial that no farm or country home owner could afford to be without its use. Every city house, building, and street, and every alley intersection could be likewise lighted at such low and moderate costs.

Under modern inventions and discoveries, modern improvements and developments, and present-day means and facilities by harnessing the streams, rivers, and falling waters, and the resistless tides of the sea and supplementing here and there with the fuel stored in the earth, electricity for heat, light, and power can be produced and carried through insulated tubes and conduits to every part of the land.

Modern discoveries and developments are progressing to make the power and force of electricity all but a rival of the sun, banish the shadows of the nighttime, and the cold from the frosts of winter. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] is recognized for 7 minutes.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with much interest to the very able remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCSWEENEY], and from his viewpoint in upholding the President's plan to increase the number of Supreme Court Justices by six I think he presented as able a case as has been presented to the Members of the House so far.

I must admit I do not concur with his reasoning or with his logic. It is true, as he pointed out, it is not a constitutional question of changing the rules of the game. It is a question of changing the umpires and putting in favorable umpires to do what you want to have done. In other words, it is accomplishing unconstitutional results by constitutional methods although verging on political trickery.

When it comes to the matter of age, does anyone seriously think that any Justice of the Supreme Court would continue to serve if the Congress enacted the legislation proposed by the President and served notice upon the judges who are over 70 years of age that they are superannuated, incompetent, and disqualified on account of age? Of course, none of them would stay on the Supreme Court if such an act were passed by the Congress. Why talk about giving them younger men to assist them any more than the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee or the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of this House would want to serve if somebody from their district were sent here because their constituents thought that by being over 70 years of age they were disqualified to serve their districts without help from a younger man. Why, by the same token, some of the most distinguished Senators would be disqualified from serving any longer in the United States Senate.

Mr. Speaker, I have asked for time to make some comments on the child-labor amendment, particularly in reference to charges that are being made that it is of communistic origin, and in reference to the status of the amendment now being considered by the New York State Legislature.

Prior to doing this I wish to serve notice that I have placed on the Clerk's desk a motion to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from further consideration of H. R. 228, which I introduced over 30 legislative days ago, similar to the Wagner bill, to assure persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws by discouraging, preventing, and punishing the crime of lynching.

This is a nonpartisan measure. I signed a petition with respect to a similar measure introduced by a Democrat in the last Congress, and I hope the Members of the House who want to expedite consideration of an antilynching bill will sign this petition. In the last Congress the motion to discharge the committee was delayed so long that there was not sufficient time to bring up the legislation for consideration before adjournment. In order to obviate repetition of such an unfortunate procedure, an opportunity is afforded every Member of the House to sign the motion to discharge the committee without further delay. If sufficient Members sign the petition, the bill will then automatically come before the House and can be amended or perfected in any way desired by a majority vote. The purpose of the bill is to expedite favorable action on antilynching legislation and help put an end to the dastardly and cowardly crime of lynching.

I cannot understand the inspired attacks on the child-labor amendment depicting it as being of Communist origin. The amendment originated in a Republican Congress in 1924, was adopted by a two-thirds vote in a Republican House and Senate, and was endorsed by President Calvin Coolidge, who said its purpose was—

> To protect the child life of the Nation from unwarranted imposition of toil and that it might have greater opportunity for enlightenment. All these movements are in the direction of increased national freedom and an advance toward the realization of the vision of Washington and Lincoln.

If the child-labor amendment is communistic, then by the same token Calvin Coolidge, Herbert Hoover, and Alfred Landon, all of whom approved it, must be Communists.

There is not an iota of truth or a scintilla of evidence that there is the slightest connection, direct or indirect, between the effort to abolish the economic slavery of children in mines and factories with communism. Congress has no intention to legislate except to regulate or prohibit the labor of children in industry, the factories, mills, and mines. The amendment does not give the faintest power to Congress to control children in schools, churches, or homes. There ought not to be a single American child under 15 years of age employed in the factories, mines, or sweatshops.

The infamy of child labor is conceded, and it must be stopped by a uniform Nation-wide law, equally fair to all States, including New York, which already has a model child-labor law and because of which is being discriminated against and losing industry to States with lower standards.

Child labor is a crime against humanity, undermining tens of thousands of American children in body, mind, and soul for sake of profit, greed, and bigger dividends by chiselers and human vultures.

Of course, these are not our children who are being exploited. They are not the children of the rich and well-to-do, who swell the chorus in denouncing the Child Labor Act as communistic without having even read the amendment and without knowing that it originated in a Republican Congress.

It is a humanitarian measure and should have the support of all elements in our population. Whether or not it is adopted, I propose to scotch the unfair, untrue, and hysterical propaganda that it is of Communist origin. If the Communists are for it, it speaks well for the Communists, and anyone who gives them credit for originating it is promoting communism.

The best way to stop the spread of communism in our country is to do away with economic sores and cancers like child labor and stand for social and industrial justice and a square deal for labor. Communism breeds on economic evils and abuses such as child labor.

American labor, organized or unorganized, who know the evil effects of child labor, are unanimously for the amendment. Let the Republicans in the New York Assembly stand with the wage earners for this humanitarian measure and for social progress and thereby restore the confidence of the people in our party. Any other course is suicidal and plays into the hands of President Roosevelt in his efforts to pack and control the Supreme Court, due to the delay in adopting the child-labor amendment.

It is time the Republicans followed the humane principles and policies of Abraham Lincoln and Theodore Roosevelt, if they want to continue as a party in the industrial centers, and not the organized manufacturers and the New York State Economic Council, backed by wealth and reaction.

Former Senator Albert J. Beveridge, the author of the Life of John Marshall, and certainly no Communist, was the original sponsor of the child-labor amendment. He urged it with great conviction and eloquence for 4 successive days in the United States Senate, in February 1907, just 30 years ago. I emphatically deny that any Communist ever had anything to do with initiating or writing the national child-labor amendment, and it is time that this hysterical and false propaganda is stopped and the amendment ratified. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter which I wrote the Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Harold L. Ickes, together with his reply on the subject of the amendment of the Raker Act with reference to the use of Hetch Hetchy power in the city of San Francisco.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a copy of a letter written by our colleague the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. PHILLIPS] in connection with pending legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my remarks made on the floor this afternoon may be extended and revised in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech delivered by the Honorable Michael Francis Doyle, chairman of the electoral college committee, at the dinner of the Presidential electors.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, that is contrary to the rules of the Joint Committee on Printing, and I shall have to object to the request.

(Mr. SHANLEY asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.)

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted, as follows:

To Mr. GILCHRIST, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. BOYKIN, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. SCRUGHAM, indefinitely, on account of illness.

SENATE ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 62. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a free highway bridge across the Missouri River at or near Atchison, Kans.;

S. 206. An act to provide a preliminary examination and survey of the Snake River and tributaries in the States of Idaho, Washington, and Oregon, with a view to control of flood waters;

S. 1128. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to accept gifts and bequests for the benefit of the Office of Naval Records and Library, Navy Department;

S. 1130. An act to authorize the acceptance of certain lands in the city of San Diego, Calif., by the United States, and the transfer by the Secretary of the Navy of certain other lands to said city of San Diego; and

S. J. Res. 84. Joint resolution to authorize the Postmaster General to withhold the awarding of star-route contracts for a period of 60 days.

BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on March 1, 1937, present to the President, for his approval, a bill and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 2518. An act to provide for retirement of Justices of the Supreme Court; and

H. J. Res. 96. Joint resolution to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, March 3, 1937, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON RIVERS AND HARBORS

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors will meet Wednesday, March 3, 1937, at 10:30 a. m. to hold hearings on the following projects: Waterway from White Lake to Pecan Island, La.; New London Harbor, Conn.; Old River, Calif.; Put in Bay, Ohio; St. Jones River, Del.

COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION

The Committee on Immigration and Naturalization will hold a hearing on H. R. 30, to protect the artistic earning opportunities in the United States for American actors, vocal, etc., at 10: 30 a. m., Wednesday, March 3, 1937, in room 445, House Office Building.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

402. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriations for the legislative establishment, Architect of the Capitol, for the fiscal year 1938, in the sum of $346,368 (H. Doc. No. 157); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

403. A letter from the Chairman, Federal Trade Commission, transmitting a report on principal farm products—agricultural income inquiry; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

404. A letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting a draft of a bill to amend the act of March 16, 1934, relating to the migratory bird hunting stamp; to the Committee on Agriculture.

405. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of a bill proposing to amend section 11 of an act approved May 14, 1898 (30 Stat. 409, 414), so as to permit free use of timber on public lands in Alaska by churches; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

406. A letter from the Acting Chairman, United States Tariff Commission, transmitting a report on United States-Philippine trade, with special reference to the Philippine Independence Act and other recent legislation; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII,

Mr. COCHRAN: Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. H. R. 5122. A bill to authorize certain officers and employees to administer oaths to expense accounts; without amendment (Rept. No. 348). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. UMSTEAD: Committee on Appropriations. H. R. 5232. A bill making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes; without amendment (Rept. No. 349). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BURCH: Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. H. R. 4408. A bill to provide for the renewal of star-route contracts at 4-year intervals, and for other purposes; with amendment (Rept. No. 350). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: Committee on Appropriations. House Joint Resolution 252. Joint resolution to aid in defraying the expenses of the International Labor Office incident to holding its Technical Tripartite Textile Conference; without amendment (Rept. No. 351). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Under clause 2 of rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5151) for the relief of the heirs-at-law of Barnabas W. Baker and Joseph Baker; Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (H. R. 4667) for the relief of Maj. Wilbur Rogers; Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (H. R. 4458) for the relief of Frank D. Cottrell; Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (H. R. 735) for the relief of William Zeiss; Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (H. R. 5087) for the relief of Benjamin Wayler; Committee on Naval Affairs discharged, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (H. R. 5085) for the relief of Daniel J. O'Neill; Committee on Naval Affairs discharged, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 3 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. MOUTON: A bill (H. R. 5231) to protect domestic producers of sugar beets and sugar cane and to encourage the domestic production thereof by the regulation of foreign and interstate commerce in sugar; to provide for the fixing and revision of yearly quotas of sugar that may be imported into, transported to, or received in continental United States; to maintain a continuous and stable supply of sugar in continental United States for the benefit of both producers and consumers; and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. UMSTEAD: A bill (H. R. 5232) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. BARDEN: A bill (H. R. 5233) to provide for the transfer of enlisted men of the Coast Guard to the Fleet Naval Reserve; to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. LEA: A bill (H. R. 5234) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by providing for the regulation of the transportation of passengers and property by air carriers in interstate, overseas, and foreign commerce, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. WITHROW: A bill (H. R. 5235) for the relief of dairy farmers, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. JACOBSEN: A bill (H. R. 5236) granting pensions and increase of pensions to widows of certain sailors, soldiers, and marines of the Civil War, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KNUTSON: A bill (H. R. 5237) to amend the Social Security Act with respect to its application to employees of fraternal beneficiary societies, orders, and associations; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. FARLEY: A bill (H. R. 5238) for payment of compensation to persons serving as postmaster at third- and fourth-class post offices; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. WEARIN: A bill (H. R. 5239) to amend the Farm Credit Act of 1933; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. PETTENGILL: A bill (H. R. 5240) authorizing the erection of a memorial to Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski at Savannah, Ga.; to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. GREEN: A bill (H. R. 5241) to establish the Fort Caroline National Monument in Duval County, Fla.; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. O'CONNELL of Montana: A bill (H. R. 5242) to provide for the acquisition of a site for and establishment of a fish hatchery for Glacier National Park, in the State of Montana, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. SHEPPARD: A bill (H. R. 5243) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the attorney general of the State of California to bring suit in the Court of Claims on behalf of the Indians of California", approved May 18, 1928 (45 Stat. L. 602), by amending certain portions thereof and by adding certain provisions thereto; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. MERRITT: A bill (H. R. 5244) providing for continuing retirement pay, under certain conditions, of officers and former officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps of the United States, other than officers of the Regular Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, who incurred physical disability while in the service of the United States during the World War, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. O'NEILL of New Jersey: A bill (H. R. 5245) for the relief of clerks employed in third-class post offices, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Civil Service.

By Mr. O'LEARY: A bill (H. R. 5246) to reduce the rate of interest on obligations of home owners to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. MAGNUSON: A bill (H. R. 5247) regulating the performance of work by the enlisted or commissioned personnel of the United States Navy, Army, and Coast Guard; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. PIERCE: A bill (H. R. 5248) to provide for the further improvement of the Columbia and Snake Rivers in Oregon and Idaho; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. AMLIE: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 256) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to be known as the human-rights amendment; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PETTENGILL: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 257) to provide for the preparation, printing, and distribution of pamphlets containing the history of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski, Revolutionary War hero, on occasion of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski, on October 11, 1929, with certain biographical sketches and explanatory matter; to the Committee on Printing.

Also, joint resolution (H. J. Res. 258) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, joint resolution (H. J. Res. 259) authorizing the President of the United States of America to proclaim October 11 of each year General Pulaski's Memorial Day for the observance and commemoration of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CLUETT: A bill (H. R. 5249) for the relief of Lydia M. White; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. DELANEY: A bill (H. R. 5250) for the relief of the J. M. Dooley Fireproof Warehouse Corporation, of Brooklyn, N. Y.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. DEMPSEY: A bill (H. R. 5251) for the relief of the estate of Careno De Vargas; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. EBERHARTER: A bill (H. R. 5252) for the relief of the General Electric Supply Corporation; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. FARLEY: A bill (H. R. 5253) granting a pension to Eliza Williams; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5254) granting a pension to Catherine Keyser; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GASQUE: A bill (H. R. 5255) authorizing the Secretary of War to bestow the award of the Purple Heart upon Samuel Gershon; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HOBBS: A bill (H. R. 5256) for the relief of Mae Savage Black; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McGEHEE: A bill (H. R. 5257) for the relief of Gulledge Lumber Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

Also a bill (H. R. 5258) for the relief of the Jackson Casket & Manufacturing Co.; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MAGNUSON: A bill (H. R. 5259) for the relief of John S. Monahan; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. MERRITT: A bill (H. R. 5260) for the relief of Col. William H. Noble; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PETERSON of Georgia: A bill (H. R. 5261) for the relief of Alfred Lelon Anderson; to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5262) for the relief of Mrs. Thomas Martin Pinckney; to the Committee on the Civil Service.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5263) for the relief of George Wornock Young; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5264) for the relief of the heirs of Richard B. Sconyers; to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5265) for the relief of Gus Smith; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PETTENGILL: A bill (H. R. 5266) for the relief of Peter S. Kaminski; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. REECE of Tennessee: A bill (H. R. 5267) for the relief of J. N. Patterson; to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5268) to extend the benefits of the Employees' Compensation Act of September 7, 1916, to James M. Harwood; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SCOTT: A bill (H. R. 5269) granting a pension to Ruby Willis Crowell; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHORT: A bill (H. R. 5270) granting a pension to Alta Burkhart; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

COURT ORDERS RESTRAINING ENFORCEMENT OF LAWS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board (with an accompanying paper) (S. Doc. No. 29), submitting the information requested by Senate Resolution 82 (agreed to on the 17th ultimo), calling for certain information concerning injunctions or judgments issued or rendered by Federal courts since March 4, 1933, in cases involving acts of Congress, which, with the accompanying paper (and annual report of the Board), was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Idaho, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Whereas the white pine blister rust was imported from Europe to the New England States, from which point it has spread to Idaho; and

Whereas the white pine blister rust, if uncontrolled, will kill all five-needle pines, including White Pine, which is the most important timber species in Idaho; and

Whereas the loss of white pine will mean the loss of employment for thousands of men now engaged in lumbering operations in Idaho, and also a heavy loss in assessed values of the counties: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring), That it recommends to the President and to the Congress of the United States, and to the Secretary of Agriculture, and to he Chief of the Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine, that Federal funds that are now available or are hereafter made available for the control of white pine blister rust, be expended on private and State timberlands, as well as upon Federally owned timberlands; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Idaho be, and he is hereby directed, to forward copies of this memorial to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Senators and Representatives of the Pacific Northwest States, the Secretary of Agriculture, and to the Chief of the Bureau of Entomology and Plant Industry.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys:

A memorial to the Secretary of the Interior of the United States of America requesting that the old Lincoln County courthouse, in Lincoln, Lincoln County, N. Mex., be declared a national monument

Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of New Mexico:

Whereas the old Lincoln County courthouse, in Lincoln, at Lincoln County, N. Mex., is a site of great historic interest and concern to the inhabitants of the entire Southwest because of its early connection with William Bonney, alias Billy the Kid, and the old Lincoln County war; and

Whereas we desire to preserve and perpetuate these old associations as things of great interest to our citizens and to our posterity; and

Whereas the State of New Mexico is not financially able to continue this old historic site in a state of proper repair and preservation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of New Mexico does hereby memorialize and request the Secretary of the Interior to recommend to the President of the United States that he declare said courthouse a national monument and provide sufficient funds for its restoration and repair; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be mailed to each of our Senators and Representative and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate of the United States Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorials of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which were referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

Your memorialist, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, in its thirteenth regular session assembled, respectfully represents:

Whereas by the action of the Government in Washington the price of gold has been advanced from $20.67 to $35 per fine ounce; and

Whereas such increase in the price of gold has reflected increased production and a more intensive search for gold in Alaska; and

Whereas large areas of gold-bearing gravel are known to exist in the Forty Mile District, about 200 miles east of the city of Fairbanks; and

Whereas new discoveries of gold-bearing lodes have been discovered in the valley of the Goodpaster River, about 120 miles east of the city of Fairbanks; and

Whereas successful mining operations today depend upon the use of modern equipment that must be transported overland and no roads exist into the districts referred to over which such equipment can be transported; and

Whereas a road constructed to serve the areas referred to would be tributary to and contribute to the support of the Government-built-and-operated railroad terminating at Fairbanks; and

Whereas such road, if constructed, would constitute a link in the proposed highway connecting Alaska with the United States; and

Whereas a hasty reconnaissance has already been made along the proposed location of said road that the distance is approximately 200 miles and that it is known to be practicable and feasible: Now, therefore,

Your memorialist respectfully petitions and prays for the immediate construction of a road from a point on the Richardson Highway, near Big Delta, through the Goodpaster and Forty Mile mining districts to the Canadian boundary;

And your memorialist will ever pray.

House Joint Memorial 15

To the honorable, the President of the United States, the Congress of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Commerce, the Delegate to Congress from Alaska, and the Alaska Road Commission:

Your memorialist, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, in regular session assembled, respectfully represents that:

Whereas the vast Territory of Alaska, comprising some 590,000 square miles of land, has less than 2,500 miles of road; and

Whereas the waterways are frozen over and inoperative for several months each year; and

Whereas the airplane is our only mode of transportation to many points in the summer, and to practically all points in the winter, excepting along the southeastern coast and the railroad belt; and

Whereas the commercial and economic development of Alaska under modern transportation conditions involves an extended airport program, costing at least $2,900,000 in primary construction and equipment; and

Whereas the Bureau of Air Commerce has made a complete survey of the situation in Alaska, outlining a program of work which is deemed essential and an interdepartmental committee composed of representatives of the various branches of the Government interested in Alaska has agreed not only to the details of the program but also to its essential character in the national program; and

Whereas the Territory of Alaska is represented in Congress by the Honorable ANTHONY J. DIMOND, who has a voice but no vote in that body, and must rely upon Congress for support of any Alaskan cause in voting action:

Now, therefore, we, your memorialist, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, respectfully represent that this body go on record strongly supporting the development program involving the selection and improvement of at least 169 airports at an estimated cost of $2,900,000, pursuant to the survey made under order of the Bureau of Air Commerce and approved by the interdepartmental committee; and

We respectfully request that at least one Congressman from each of the States call upon the President urging presentation of the Alaska airport program, and strongly recommend that the finances required to carry the same through be provided from emergency funds or regular appropriations, and if it is found that the task is too great to be accomplished in 1 year, that a start be made the coming fiscal year and be completed as soon as practicable thereafter.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

Approved by the Governor February 20, 1937.

JOHN W. TROY,
Governor of Alaska.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Dallas (Tex.) Nonpartisan Political League, and Local No. 761, International Hod Carriers' Building and Common Laborers' Union of America, of New Bethlehem, Pa., favoring the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Association of the Bar of the City of New York, N. Y., and by a public meeting of citizens of Riverton, Palmyra, and vicinity in the State of New Jersey, protesting against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HALE presented memorials, numerously signed, of sundry citizens of the State of Maine, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, especially the proposal to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALSH presented resolutions unanimously adopted by members of the First Congregational Church of Clinton; the board of directors of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, and the council of the Bar Association of the City of Boston, all in the State of Massachusetts, protesting against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, of Massachusetts, opposing the enactment of legislation providing industrial mobilization in case of war; and favoring Government manufacture of war munitions, the placing of embargoes on munitions of war and essential raw materials, and the prohibition of loans and credits to belligerent nations, and also favoring the enactment of the so-called Nye-Kvale bill, withdrawing Federal subsidies from colleges requiring military training, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by the New York City branch of the National League of Wholesale Fresh Fruit & Vegetable Distributors, favoring the postponement of legislative action by Congress relative to the interim report of the Federal Trade Commission on its investigation, made pursuant to law, in connection with the distribution of fresh fruits and vegetables, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the board of estimate and apportionment of the city of New York, favoring the construction of two new battleships, authorized for the year 1937, at the Brooklyn (N. Y.) Navy Yard, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a petition of several citizens of New York City, N. Y., praying for an appropriation to purchase for the Nation the stand of pines at the entrance to Yosemite National Park known as the Yosemite Sugar Pines, and also the enactment of legislation for establishment of the Mount Olympus National Park according to the boundaries as outlined in the so-called Wallgren bill (including the present Mount Olympus National Forest), which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I present a telegram signed by Gene Gaillac, business manager, Local Union No. 595, International Brotherhood Electrical Workers, of Oakland, Calif., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OAKLAND, CALIF., March 3, 1937.

SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C.:

Local Union 595, International Brotherhood Electrical Workers, is officially on record as unanimously supporting President Roosevelt's judiciary reform program. This expresses prevailing union-labor sentiment in this community. We are counting on your undivided support of the President in this vitally necessary movement.

GENE GAILLAC, Business Manager.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I present a letter from the Detroit Federation of Women's Clubs, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DETROIT FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S CLUBS,
Detroit, Mich., February 27, 1937.

Hon. ARTHUR VANDENBERG,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Believing that a change such as proposed in the Supreme Court would endanger the security of the country and that the judiciary would no longer exercise final restraint on other governmental departments, and might even become the political pawn of any Executive during his administration, the board of directors of the Detroit Federation of Women's Clubs, representing 17,000 Detroit clubwomen, strongly protest such a change, and are watching with great anxiety and interest action taken by your honorable body on the proposed amendment.

Sincerely yours,

(Mrs. DEWITT L.) MABEL C. SHERWOOD, Corresponding Secretary.

Mr. McCARRAN. I present a memorial in the form of a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Nevada, bearing on the subject of the acquisition of mining claims on the open public domain.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, and is as follows:

Assembly joint resolution memorializing Congress to leave undisturbed the present legal method of acquiring mining claims, mines, and rights connected therewith

Whereas Hon. Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior, has publicly recommended that all mining claims, mines, and their appurtenances should be leased from the Government of the United States of America; and

Whereas such a method necessarily involves the discontinuance of the present method of acquiring mining rights by location and the present methods which have been in vogue for many years, and with which the prospectors of the United States are thoroughly familiar; and

Whereas the law of the mining States and of the United States has become settled, definite, and intelligible after years of litigation which has cleared up practically all questions involved under present methods of acquiring mining rights, while a new method would undoubtedly open the doors to protracted and expensive litigation, to the great disadvantage of the ordinary prospector; and

Whereas the present method makes it possible for the discoverer to forthwith establish his claim to the discovery area, while the slower method of application for lease from the Government would delay mining operations, involve the acquisition of mining property with red tape, and throw open the door to fraud and other similar difficulties; and

Whereas the discovery of new mines is wholly dependent upon the work of the prospector, whose profession is a highly specialized one, entailing a life of drudgery, hardship, and privation; and

Whereas the prospector in turn is dependent upon his right to acquire ownership to and sell his discoveries and locations to the operator who, alone, is financially able to develop the new finds into mines; and

Whereas it is patent that without the element of ownership and the hope of sale the prospector is deprived of his only incentive for prospecting, and that without prospecting no new mines will be found, and the result will be an irreparable loss to the mining industry, the throwing out of employment hundreds of thousands of specialized miners and greatly curtailing revenues of the individual States and the Federal Government; and

Whereas the sentiment in the mining States, expressed since the public announcement of the honorable Secretary of the Interior, has been unanimously adverse to that suggestion: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of Nevada, That Congress be memorialized to leave the present legal method of acquiring mining claims, mines, and rights connected therewith undisturbed; and be it further

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Assembly and Senate of the State of Nevada that such is for the best interests of the mining industry of the United States and for those engaged in prospecting and mining; and be it further

Resolved, That duly certified copies of these resolutions be transmitted by the secretary of state to the President of the United States Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to each of the United States Senators from Nevada, and to the Nevada Representative in Congress.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, on behalf of the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] and myself, I present, for printing in the RECORD and appropriate reference, four joint memorials of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, one memorializing Congress to enact legislation for the purchase of a site in Wyoming to be used as one of the proposed Army air bases of the War Department (House Joint Memorial 1); another to enact legislation reducing the hours of labor per day and per week in all gainful occupations except agriculture (House Joint Memorial 2); a third to enact legislation permitting the State of Wyoming to enact legislation prohibiting the importation into and sale within that State of products of the labor of persons under 18 years of age, except agricultural production (Senate Joint Memorial 3); and a fourth to enact legislation creating a National Planning Board (Senate Joint Memorial 2).

The joint memorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and were referred to committees as indicated below.

To the Committee on Military Affairs:

House Joint Memorial 1

House joint memorial memorializing the Congress of the United States to enact legislation for the purpose of securing from the War Department an approval of a site within the borders of the State of Wyoming, to be used as one of the proposed Army air bases of the War Department of the United States Government

Whereas the State of Wyoming is so located in such a strategical position, in the area of the United States, between all points of the Pacific coast and the Mississippi Valley territory as to afford ample means for defense in times of emergency; and

Whereas in practically any section of Wyoming unlimited area of even terrain can be acquired for the use of an Army air base in times of peace as well as war; and

Whereas the elevation in practically any section of Wyoming, ranging from 4,000 to 7,000 feet above sea level, is of immense value in the training of Army air pilots; and

Whereas the State of Wyoming has within its borders one or more approved airports or landing areas in each of its 23 counties, any of which can be used to advantage in conducting Army air maneuvers; and

Whereas the State of Wyoming has within its borders a permanent United States Army post, known as Fort Francis E. Warren, and such post would be of great assistance from an economic standpoint in maintaining an Army air base; and

Whereas the State of Wyoming is located on the direct route of the Atlantic to Pacific transcontinental air lanes, with Government radio and lighted beacons already established; and

Whereas in the city of Cheyenne huge aviation repair shops are maintained, with facilities that can be converted to Government use in times of emergency; and

Whereas approved airports are located in the cities of Cheyenne, Laramie, Rawlins, and Rock Springs, on the transcontinental air route, and at Wheatland, Douglas, Casper, and Sheridan on the north and south air routes, all in the State of Wyoming: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the Twenty-fourth Legislature of the State of Wyoming, the Senate concurring, memorialize the Congress of the United States to secure from the War Department an approval of a site in the State of Wyoming, which would be used as one of the proposed Army air bases of the War Department of the United States Government, when Congress approves selection of such sites for this purpose; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be sent to the President of the United States, the Honorable JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, the Honorable HARRY H. SCHWARTZ, and the Honorable PAUL R. GREEVER.

To the Committee on Education and Labor:

House Joint Memorial 2

House joint memorial memorializing the Congress of the United States to enact legislation for the purpose of reducing the hours per day and per week of all employees engaged in gainful occupations in industries and public utilities, except agriculture, declaring same to be a matter of public policy

Whereas the introduction of machinery and labor-displacing devices in industry has created a vast amount of unemployment among workers formerly engaged in gainful occupations by industries and public utilities, except agriculture, in the United States; and

Whereas by reason of such machinery and labor-displacing devices the industries and public utilities, except agriculture, will not be able to absorb the surplus of labor available by continuing long hours per day or per week: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Twenty-fourth Legislature of the State of Wyoming (the senate concurring), That we hereby memorialize the Congress of the United States to enact suitable legislation to prohibit employment in gainful occupations in industry or public utilities which will be benefited thereby, except agriculture, beyond 30 hours per week; and be it further

Resolved, That sufficient safeguards be provided to maintain adequate wage structures; and be it further

Resolved, That copies hereof be forwarded to the President of the United States, to the Honorable JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, to the Honorable HARRY H. SCHWARTZ, and the Honorable PAUL R. GREEVER.

Senate Joint Memorial 3

Joint memorial memorializing the Congress of the United States to enact legislation permitting the State of Wyoming to enact legislation prohibiting the importation into and the sale within the State of Wyoming of the products of child labor

Whereas the manufacturers, merchants, and labor of this State are subject to unfair competition by reason of the importation into and the sale within this State of goods, wares, and merchandise which are manufactured, produced, or mined wholly or in part by persons under 18 years of age; and

Whereas such condition of affairs tends to weaken and render ineffective safeguards which the State of Wyoming has enacted for the protection of children, and further tends to lower the educational and health standards of children in this State; and

Whereas there has been introduced in the Senate of the United States a bill to permit the several States to prohibit the importation into or the sale within the State of such goods, wares, and merchandise: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be, and it hereby is, respectfully memorialized to enact, with all convenient speed, said bill or such other legislation as may be necessary to permit the State of Wyoming to enact legislation prohibiting the importation into and the sale within the State of Wyoming of goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined wholly or in part by persons under 18 years of age: Provided, That such bill or other legislation shall not apply to agricultural production; be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this memorial be sent to the President of the United States Senate and the Speaker of the National House of Representatives, and to United States Senators JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY and HARRY H. SCHWARTZ, and to Congressman PAUL R. GREEVER.

Senate Joint Memorial 2

A joint memorial memorializing the Congress of the United States to enact legislation to create a National Planning Board

Whereas the National Resources Committee has developed an intensive program of research and investigation in the several States looking toward a complete survey of the national and potential resources of such States; and

Whereas the State Planning Board of the State of Wyoming has cooperated with all existing Federal agencies without abandoning any of the rights and privileges of our sovereign States; and

Whereas the National Resources Committee, an agency set up by direction of the President of the United States, has sponsored the creation of a National Planning Board by act of Congress to continue this worthy program: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Wyoming (the house of representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, memorialized to enact suitable legislation creating a National Planning Board for the purpose of carrying out the program initiated by the National Resources Committee, and that adequate funds be provided to carry out its purposes; be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this memorial be sent to the President of the Senate of the United States and the Speaker of the National House of Representatives, and to United States Senators JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY and HARRY H. SCHWARTZ, and to Representative PAUL R. GREEVER.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 5) to recognize April 6 of each year as Army Day (submitted by Mr. SHEPPARD on the 3d ultimo), reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 149) thereon.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1272) for the relief of James Meagher, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 146) thereon.

Mr. BURKE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 1435. A bill to create a Board of Shorthand Reporting, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 147); and

S. 1436. A bill providing for the employment of skilled shorthand reporters in the executive branch of the Government (Rept. No. 148).

Mr. OVERTON, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3689) declaring Turtle Bay and Turtle Bayou, Chambers County, Tex., to be nonnavigable waterways, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 150) thereon.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICES AND POST ROADS

As in executive session,

Mr. MCKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters, which were ordered to be placed on the Executive Calendar.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on the 2d instant that committee presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills and joint resolution:

S. 62. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a free highway bridge across the Missouri River at or near Atchison, Kans.;

S. 206. An act to provide a preliminary examination and survey of the Snake River and tributaries in the States of Idaho, Washington, and Oregon, with a view to control of floodwaters;

S. 1128. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to accept gifts and bequests for the benefit of the Office of Naval Records and Library, Navy Department;

S. 1130. An act to authorize the acceptance of certain lands in the city of San Diego, Calif., by the United States, and the transfer by the Secretary of the Navy of certain other lands to said city of San Diego; and

S. J. Res. 84. Joint resolution to authorize the Postmaster General to withhold the awarding of star-route contracts for a period of 60 days.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HATCH:

A bill (S. 1758) granting an increase of pension to Bramble B. Ownby; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WHEELER:

A bill (S. 1775) to authorize a survey to determine the feasibility of irrigation projects, flood control, and power plants in the Marias River watershed in the State of Montana; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

ASSESSMENT WORK ON MINING CLAIMS—CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 187) providing for the suspension of annual assessment work on mining claims held by location in the United States, and that it be referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, where similar bills have usually gone. I should like also to have printed in the RECORD a letter or report from the Secretary of the Interior in reference to this bill and to have the report referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys is discharged from the further consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from Colorado, and the bill is referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining; and, without objection, the report indicated by the Senator from Colorado will be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The letter or report is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 1, 1937.

Hon. ALVA B. ADAMS,
Chairman, Committee on Public Lands and Surveys,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR ADAMS: I have received your letter of January 16 requesting a report on S. 187, entitled "A bill providing for the suspension of annual assessment work on mining claims held by location in the United States."

During the depression it was recognized that the operation of the law requiring annual assessment work on unpatented mining claims might result in undue hardship to claim owners, who, through no fault of their own, were unable to comply with this requirement. Beginning with 1932, the Congress has each year enacted legislation suspending the annual assessment work requirement for a period of 1 year. There seems little question of the desirability of such action in the first depression years but, for the reasons stated below, I am of the opinion that the time has arrived, when in the public interest, particularly in the stimulation of mining development and employment in the mining industry, that the exemption from the requirement of annual labor should no longer be continued.

The purpose of annual assessment work, as the courts have stated, is to require the holder of a mining claim to give substantial guaranty of his good faith and to discourage the holding of mining claims without development or intention to develop to the exclusion of others who might improve such ground if opportunity was afforded. Incidentally, the requirement stimulates the owners to apply for patent and abandon ground they have no means to explore and thus throw it open to relocation and development by others, and militates against the indefinite withdrawal from prospecting of potentially valuable areas of the public domain. For over half a century the requirement has contributed to active exploration and development of the mineral resources of the public domain. It is believed that there would now be a great increase in the search for and discovery of ore if so much land was not closed to prospecting by owners who are permitted to be inactive by relief from the requirement.

Information furnished by the Bureau of Mines is to the effect that the reestablishment of the obligation to perform annual labor in certain districts in Idaho would result in large increases in wages paid and in the employment of labor. It is a fair assumption that this would occur to a greater or less extent in any active mining district in the Western States. The thousands of acres, now exempt, upon which assessment work would have to be performed would bring into local communities considerable money and restore a means of livelihood to many who have relied upon this means of employment in the past, which would, it is believed, more than counterbalance any hardship to the limited number of claim owners too poor or otherwise unable to do or have the work done.

Evidence of improvement in the metal markets since the low point of 1932 is shown in the accompanying tabulations and charts. Mining activity and the search for new deposits have been stimulated by higher prices, fixed by the Government, for domestically mined gold and silver and the more recent improvement in base metal prices. As a result, less difficulty is experienced in financing development of meritorious prospects, and the means to perform the small amount of assessment work required to hold a claim is more readily obtained.

While the bill provides that only those claimants not required to pay income taxes are to be granted suspension, a large percentage of unpatented claims are undoubtedly held by individuals or corporations who do not pay income taxes. In some cases a corporation is organized for the purpose of holding the undeveloped claims and, of course, such a corporation will have no income until the claims are developed into paying mines. Also, devices can be resorted to in order to bring a claim actually or ostensibly within the provisions of the bill, so that while such a law is in force no prospector can determine on ground on which no recent work has been done whether or not the claim is subject to relocation. If he goes to the county recorder's office and finds a notice of claim of exemption, he cannot easily determine whether or not the notice is evidence of a legal right to the exemption.

For the reasons stated I do not favor the enactment of the proposed bill.

In response to a request by this Department, the Bureau of the Budget advised on February 24 that it had no objection to the presentation of this report.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES WEST,
Acting Secretary of the Interior.

REGULATION OF COMMERCE BY AIRCRAFT—AMENDMENT

Mr. McCARRAN submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by providing for the regulation of the transportation of passengers and property by aircraft in interstate commerce, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed.

REGULATION OF COMMERCE BY WATER CARRIERS—AMENDMENT

Mr. LONERGAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1400) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by providing for the regulation of the transportation of passengers and property by water carriers operating in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed.

REGULATION OF TRAFFIC IN FOOD, DRUGS, AND COSMETICS—AMENDMENT

Mr. MOORE submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 5) to prevent the adulteration, misbranding, and false advertisement of food, drugs, devices, and cosmetics in interstate, foreign, and other commerce subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, for the purposes of safeguarding the public health, preventing deceit upon the purchasing public, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

INVESTIGATION OF WOOL PRODUCTION, TRANSPORTATION, AND MARKETING—LIMIT OF EXPENDITURES

Mr. ADAMS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 90), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the limit of expenditures under S. Res. 160, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session, agreed to July 10, 1935, authorizing a special committee to investigate the production, transportation, and marketing of wool, as extended by S. Res. 315, Seventy-fourth Congress, second session, agreed to June 6, 1936, is hereby increased by $10,000.

COURT ORDERS RESTRAINING ENFORCEMENT OF LAWS—PRINTING OF RESPONSES

On motion by Mr. McCARRAN, and by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the responses to Senate Resolution 82 (agreed to Feb. 17, 1937), calling for certain information concerning injunctions issued or judgments rendered by Federal courts since March 4, 1933, in cases involving acts of Congress, received from the Federal Power Commission (S. Doc. No. 30), February 24; the Social Security Board (S. Doc. No. 28), February 24; and the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works (S. Doc. No. 27), March 1, be printed as Senate documents.

AMERICAN NEUTRALITY

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 51) to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war", approved August 31, 1935, being Public Resolution No. 67, Seventy-fourth Congress (S. J. Res. 173), as amended by joint resolution approved February 29, 1936, entitled "Joint resolution extending and amending the joint resolution (Public Res. 67, 74th Cong.) approved August 31, 1935."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] to the amendment in the nature of a substitute reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The amendment of Mr. VANDENBERG to the amendment is, in section 2, to strike out paragraphs (a), (c), and (d), as follows:

(a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations as provided in section 1 of this act and he shall thereafter find that the placing of restrictions on the shipment of certain articles or materials in addition to arms, ammunition, and implements of war from the United States to said belligerents named in the proclamation issued under said section 1, or to a country wherein civil strife has been proclaimed to exist, is deemed necessary to promote the security or preserve the peace or neutrality of the United States or to protect the lives and commerce of nationals of the United States, he shall so proclaim, and it shall thereafter be unlawful for any American vessel or aircraft to carry such articles or materials to any belligerent country, or any country wherein civil strife exists, named in said proclamation or proclamations issued under section 1 of this act, or to any other country for transshipment to, or for the use of, such belligerent countries or within such country where civil strife exists. The President shall by proclamation from time to time definitely enumerate said articles and materials which it shall be unlawful for American vessels or aircraft to transport.

(c) The President shall from time to time by proclamation extend such restrictions as are imposed under subsection (a) of this section to other countries as and when they may be declared to become belligerents under proclamations issued under section 1 of this act.

(d) The President may from time to time change, modify, or revoke in whole or in part any proclamations issued by him under subsection (a) of this section.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, the joint resolution which is now pending before the Senate is one of the most important measures which could come to a free people. It is a pity that the resolution is overshadowed by other legislation and concerning it Members of the Senate have been able to give not the attention which it deserves but a mere casual approach.

I congratulate the Munitions Committee, Mr. President, upon finally a goal attained. They have not attained the full goal they have sought, but they have come very close to it, and they are entitled to the meed of praise which should come from those of us who have observed their pertinacity and preseverance in this regard, and, while not admiring the result, I congratulate them upon accomplishing their purpose.

Mr. President, there are certain reasons why I oppose the joint resolution. There are many reasons, but a few of them I shall state and, if I can, I shall endeavor to express my views respecting those particular matters.

There is a simple and straightforward course that this Nation may take. We can reenact the existing law relating alone to arms, munitions, and implements of warfare and permit our people to trade as usual. They would be subject, of course, to the rules of international law, to search and seizure by belligerents, and to the perils of blockade. Those would be the risks they must take if they desire to trade, and the risks would be no greater, under those conditions, than under a measure like that which is before us.

Secondly, the joint resolution is an attempt, by a policy of scuttle and run, to take the profits out of war and shirk the responsibility. It would not accomplish its avowed purpose.

We take the profits and then hug ourselves because somebody else has to take the risk. It will not keep us out of war, because it will arouse the bitterest kind of resentment on the part of all belligerents except the one strong enough to obtain our raw materials, and that resentment will be biding its time and will not be forgotten in a generation.

Third, the discretion given to the President is, in the last analysis, a discretion to declare war, and thus Congress is proposing to abdicate its last and most important function, the power to make war.

Fourth, it makes us the ally of Great Britain in the Atlantic and of Japan in the Pacific. No other nation than Great Britain could buy with safety and convoy ships across the Atlantic, and no other nation than Japan could do the like in the Pacific.

Thus the United States under the terms of this joint resolution always will be for the strongest belligerent. The joint resolution is immoral. The country with the strongest navy might prosecute the cruelest war, and yet we, the once proud Republic, whatever the causes of war and whoever the belligerents, would always be for the strongest.

These are a few of my objections to the joint resolution. There are many others, indeed, but these still are sufficient, I take it, if they be substantiated, to prevent the passage of this measure.

International law is a living thing. It makes no difference that a nation in the recent World War put at naught all of the principles of international law. It makes no difference if a single crime should be committed and the party committing it put at naught the law respecting that crime. The fact that international law has been broken sometimes does not detract at all from the fact that it is today a living, breathing thing, and always has been ever since we have been a nation.

Mr. President, long ago we fought out this question. I do not know what change came over the spirit of our dreams, but I recall the successive steps in this kind of legislation. First was an embargo law. The administration asked that the embargo law be discretionary. The Foreign Relations Committee, standing like a rock, held that it should be mandatory, and so the only law that was enacted originally was a mandatory embargo law.

Then came the subsequent proceedings. I recall the day when the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] appeared before the Foreign Relations Committee in behalf of a bill which was then pending there, not this one entirely but one of like character. He did not have a friend upon the committee who did him the honor to agree with him in what he submitted. I recall that bill then was of the nature that the pending measure is now. Finally the State Department has yielded to the Munitions Committee and has adopted their theory. It is a theory which I believe wrong, notwithstanding the pertinacity of the Munitions Committee. It is a theory upon which no proud nation, with traditions which it regarded in the glorious way that we regard ours, could tolerate for a second. But the measure is here now and it is going to be passed. Nobody can prevent it, I take it, because there sits the majority to pass it with the assent of the Munitions Committee.

But, Senators, when you pass this joint resolution, the day will come when you will rue it. You will rue it because you will take a part in every war that is held and in every war that comes in the days to come, and you will take the part of the greatest power that is engaged in that way. In taking that part you play not the part of Americans but, as Mr. Baruch stated it, you will "scuttle and run."

It is claimed that the joint resolution permits the payment for goods at the source and then the ships go on, either American bottoms or foreign bottoms. They go ahead from the moment the goods are bought. The theory upon which the peace-at-any-price men and women worked was that it was wrong originally to sell any goods at all during war; but now it is right to sell any goods at all during war provided somebody else takes the risk.

What sort of government is this and what sort of men are we to accept a formula which will enable us to sell goods and then to hide? We can sell everything we want under this joint resolution and we can load it into the various ships which are sent here or which we ourselves send, and when we have sold those goods then we have no further liability, say our friends. True, no further liability, but we do not allow our people to trade and we permit other peoples to carry on the commerce of the world. I am not one of those who believe that in commerce there is something terrible that inures to and that oppresses our people. I was taught originally that commerce on the high seas was the lifeblood of a nation and that this was the very thing most desired by nations.

International law would not permit, under certain conditions which these gentlemen seek to avoid, that commerce to become a part of the warlike territory. International law provides for blockades if they may be maintained; provides, indeed, for search and seizure of vessels containing contraband of war; provides all that may be necessary in order to stop, if it can be done, the flow of commerce during wartime periods. But, even though that be done, there is no reason why we should not carry on our trade in our usual mode and for our usual benefit.

Answering the theory that international law was blown to smithereens, or was lost, John Bassett Moore, the greatest living authority upon that subject, says—and he said this as well to the Foreign Relations Committee a year ago—

> It has never heretofore been supposed that, when belligerents violate international law, they believe that they are destroying it or depriving it of its obligatory force. It is a maxim of the common law that in the midst of arms the laws are silent, but this does not mean that the laws cease to exist. On the contrary, the maxim merely recognizes the fact that in an armed struggle the exertion of force is likely to be carried beyond ordinary legal bounds. * * *
> It truly would be a curious notion—> that general peacetime agreements signed by nearly all the world's powers, for the improvement of international law, cannot bind nonsignatories, but that wartime violations of international law by the parties to a war, and particularly if committed by the victors in a war, destroy international law both for the victors and for the vanquished, and for the whole world besides.

Says he—

> I have spoken of the victors and the vanquished. Vanquished powers do not ordinarily cease to exist. For the most part, the vanquished powers in the late war did not cease to exist, although some of them were severely dismembered, but the fact of their dismemberment did not destroy them as members of the international family, which is concerned in preserving and making rules of international law. No authority on international law, so far as I am advised, has ever suggested either that violations of international law destroy it, or that violations of that law by the victors in a war constitute international law up to date.

When this country was young, when it was a mere fledgling among the nations of the earth, it insisted upon its right under international law to ocean commerce. Both Washington and Jefferson, one as Secretary of State and the other as President, insisted upon that right. They held their ground during a very troublous time in the world's history; and after that time they so successfully asserted that right that the British Government paid a certain sum of money, then a considerable sum, to those who had been wronged by their acts during the war.

A later case we have, the Alabama claims—which some of us may remember and recall—where the British Government violated international law and was compelled by the award to pay some $15,000,000.

And so it has ever been that during the centuries there have come down and been crystallized rules and regulations concerning international law; and this international law is the law that governs the sea, and that should govern it today. We are writing it off the books. We are writing it off the whole history of this country. We are negativing the very deeds of the men who have gone before and who have given this country its glory and its prestige. We have taken from the glory of America everything that is American.

The peace-at-any-price people may want that; but this measure is not a neutrality law, as the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] says, and it rests alone upon the views of these peace-at-any-price people. So if we desire to run a straight course, a course consonant with reason and authority, we will deal with this subject in accordance with international law. We will pass a bill simply continuing in force the present enactment and thereafter have recourse to what may be done upon the seas under international law.

Secondly, the joint resolution is an attempt, by a policy of scuttle and run, to take the profits out of war and shirk the responsibilities. That is not my definition of it. I should not be so harsh in my designation of the measure as to say that it is a scuttle-and-run measure. That is the designation of Mr. Arthur Krock, of the New York Times, who says that Mr. Baruch's scheme was cynically presented as a scuttle-and-run doctrine.

Here we are—these nations that are at war; we at peace. They insist upon certain rules and certain conduct. We resist according to international law; but no longer do we resist. We say now, "We will stay here in this country. We will be good boys. We will permit you to take what you want, and you may load it as you see fit in our ports. You may crowd New York until there is room for nothing else; and, crowding New York then with goods that are to go to you, just you wait until we hide, and then begin your journey"; and these ships begin their journey with exactly the same risks as if they were going with our goods under international law.

It may be said that it is not the same risk, because the powerful nation is the one that holds the key to the seas, and the powerful nation will pursue where the weaker nation could not pursue; and so if we enact the joint resolution and permit the goods to be sold by our country, and our people to proceed under international law, it is said that we shall be in a terrible fix, because we shall be chased by the strongest, and our goods will be taken away from us.

Not so—not so at all. The belligerents can do just exactly what international law says they can do. They have the right of seizure and search, and the right to a blockade. If they have not a blockade maintained so as to be effective, they cannot by any means interfere with us, and they must have a blockade that is effective; so we may leave that out.

How are we going to take the profits out of war with this measure? Take profits out of war? Why, you gentlemen of the Munitions Committee examined a lot of people—very great people in the commercial world, as to their profits during the war. Do you stop them now? Not so!

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. I do not wish to interrupt the thread of the Senator's argument, but merely desire at this time to call his attention to the fact that the measure now pending before the Senate is not designed for the purpose of taking the profits out of war; and until I heard the eloquent remarks of the Senator a few moments ago I had never heard this particular measure designated as being for that purpose. The bills which are pending for the purpose of taking the profits out of war—and I may say that one of them is sufficiently drastic that I feel every confidence that it will take the profits out of war—are now pending before the Finance Committee, and have nothing whatever to do with the measure now before the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I am glad to hear the remarks of the Senator. Then the Senator holds that this measure will permit the profits that have usually been accorded during war?

Mr. CLARK. I do not know that this measure has anything to do with the question of profits, except very indirectly.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Oh, it does! Do not dodge.

Mr. CLARK. I will say to the Senator that I am not dodging.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Just answer me: Will this joint resolution permit profits to be taken in the goods that are shipped?

Mr. CLARK. Within the terms of this resolution, of course, it has nothing to do with profits. It is not designed to have anything to do with profits.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Then let us assume that it has nothing to do with profits.

Mr. CLARK. I fear that my friend the Senator from California has confused two different measures.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. No; I have not. I may have confused two different people, but not two different measures.

Now let us see. The profits which are inherent in war, therefore, are not touched. I will take the Senator's statement as accurate. What in the world is being touched, then? What is sought, if the profits of war are not touched by this joint resolution at all, if just the same profits can be made in just the same way under the pending joint resolution as could have been made under any other law or without law?

No profits being touched! If that is the contention, then the joint resolution before us is one for the purpose of making profits out of war, and a neutrality measure, and a peace-at-any-price measure combined. If it is possible to have a combination of that sort, gentlemen can have any kind of a measure they prefer.

I see two of the members of the Munitions Committee consulting on the other side as to taking the profits out of war. I am very willing to let them go on and say what they desire in that regard, because it does not make any difference so far as the argument is concerned. There may be profits or there may not be; you can keep our citizens from dealing with the foreign nations which are at war or you need not; you can do anything you desire, but when we are told this is an altruistic and an idealistic measure that is designed to keep us out of war, it is going a long way to say that people can make the same profits they made during the World War. It is a strange measure, indeed, that will permit that sort of thing to be done.

What is the joint resolution? What is its purpose? What is its design? Its design is to keep us out of war. That is it, is it not, to keep us out of war? The Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] nods his head affirmatively, that it is to keep us out of war.

Keep us out of war by loading up to the very limit a ship in New York Harbor, loading it up with everything a belligerent may need, and then sending it off and running away and hiding where we can in some cellar in New York? That is a fine view for Americans to take, is it not? That is a strange measure upon which we must act, a strange measure, indeed.

What will happen to us after we load the ship in that way? Every nation on the face of the earth that is kept away by Britain—because this is a British measure, after all—every such nation will say that we are an enemy of theirs, and they will await their opportunity and bide their time to get even with us for doing as we do.

The joint resolution is of such a character that it cannot function in both ways; it cannot be made to keep us out of war or to keep the peace and at the same time let us do those acts which are calculated to arouse the resentment and the bitterness and the hatred of nations engaged in war.

Then the President is given a discretion, and that discretion is a power which ought not to be accorded him. I am aware that I touch upon a very delicate subject. I admit that. When I come to touch the President's power I touch upon a subject which nobody wishes to discuss. It is a singular thing that most of the measures granting power to the President I voted for, and I voted for them during emergencies, but I never voted to give him the war-making power, and I never will vote to give the President the war-making power, and the joint resolution before us would give to the President the war-making power.

I read from John Bassett Moore upon that subject. He says:

I would not give this unlimited power to any man. I would myself decline it if it were offered to me, even though I happen to understand the law of neutrality, and to know what is and what is not neutral according to that law. The bestowal of such power would constitute the worst form of dictatorship ever set up. The British Crown has, in theory, the war-declaring power; but, wholly apart from the fact that the succession to the Crown is heritable, and not elective, the exercise of the power is not uncontrolled. The Crown possesses, in theory, the veto power, but it has not been exercised for more than two centuries. I have never known anything more amazing than the notion that it is essential to the preservation of peace in our foreign relations that the complete control of our commerce should, whenever international war anywhere exists, be lodged in the Executive. I believe that the Central Committee in Soviet Russia possesses this power, but it has this power, as I understand, when the world is at peace as well as when war may somewhere exist. If the committee in question, of which Josef Stalin is the head, did not possess this power in peace, I do not believe it would be allowed to exercise it on the strength of the fact that war had somewhere broken out in the world. It would be a strange statute which should exempt pious men from the obligation to keep the peace, because forsooth it could not be supposed that they would ever want to break it.

In this connection I would invoke the example of Andrew Jackson, of Tennessee, whom I was as a child taught to revere. A braver man never lived, nor one less disposed to shirk responsibility. The power to recognize foreign states and foreign governments has always been conceded to the President, as an incident of his power to conduct foreign relations. But, when the question of recognizing Texas arose, Jackson, in view of the delicacy of the situation and the possibility that war might result from the recognition, and of the fact that the war-declaring power rested with the Congress, felt that he should not stand on his constitutional right, but laid the matter before Congress. (Moore, Digest of International Law, vol. 1, pp. 98–101.) As Andrew Jackson, the hero of many battles, has long slept in his honored grave, perhaps bad faith will not be imputed to him for having set an example so completely at variance with the present astounding proposal to make the first shot in any and every war the signal for the immediate exercise by the President of dictatorial powers as regards our commerce and peace and war.

This fundamental objection would not be cured by striking out the clause specifically referring to the use of the embargo power for the purpose of shortening wars. This clause was in fact superfluous, as the bill commits the entire subject to the President's uncontrolled discretion. Such is the revolutionary character of the pending measure, which is actually proposed as a part of our permanent legislation.

I have occasionally heard the suggestion that there can be no objection to conferring on the President dictatorial powers as regards peace and war because, forsooth, he can, in the exercise of his constitutional power as Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, or in the conduct of diplomatic intercourse, at any moment plunge the country into war. I utterly deny this. There is only one case in which the President is empowered to use the military forces for purposes of war without the express authority of Congress, and that is to repel invasion. The use of any of his powers so as to plunge the country into war would be a palpable violation of the Constitution and of his oath of office. The fact that such loose notions can be entertained in the United States of Executive prerogative should of itself be a solemn warning against the adoption of such legislation as that proposed, since it would remove the last doubt that the Congress had abdicated its functions as the law-making power and set up an absolute dictatorship to be exercised when the country is at peace as well as when it is at war. It would be as sensible, by an act of five lines, to repeal all laws because all living men have the physical power to violate them.

On that subject as well I do not desire to take the time to read, but I desire to present an article by Mr. Edwin M. Borchard entitled "Unneutral Neutrality." I ask unanimous consent that at this point Mr. Borchard's article may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of Feb. 7, 1937]

UNNEUTRAL NEUTRALITY—VARIOUS DANGERS SEEN IN DEMAND FOR DISCRETIONARY EMBARGOES

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

The demand for discretionary executive embargoes on "articles or materials" in addition to the mandatory embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war is growing apace. It would be a pity, however, to have the American public believe that this power involves neutrality. The issue should be stated in its real terms—the proposal that Congress, which alone has the power to declare war, should transfer to the Chief Executive the power in his discretion actually to make war.

There is reason to believe that those who demand this discretionary executive power do not desire neutrality at all. The attempt to obtain this discretionary power to help one side defeat the other was confined in 1932 and 1933 to arms, ammunition, and implements of war. When Congress in 1935 made that embargo mandatory and applied it to all belligerents, the advocates of executive discretion shifted their demand for discretion to commodities other than munitions and implements of war.

NEUTRALITY JEOPARDIZED

Those who believe that history justifies the conclusion that nations can stay out of war if they want to and that the rules of neutrality intelligently administered furnish sufficient instruments to that end, have opposed partisanship in any form as the only way to save the peace of the country. They have therefore opposed executive discretion to use the embargo power as a means of handicapping one country and helping another. Although these genuine neutrals have finally won their demand that embargoes must be applied to all belligerents, the opportunity to make selections in the kind of commodities to be embargoed leaves in the Executive the complete power to be as unneutral as he cares to be. When imposed after the outbreak of war, the handicapped belligerent will be sure to construe the discrimination as intentional.

Thus neutrality is jeopardized and will probably be lost. No President should place himself in the position to which he will be exposed by those who will thus want to help their friends and down their enemies. Many of those who urge the grant of discretionary power are the groups that have from the beginning sought to put the United States behind article 16 of the covenant of the League of Nations "to enforce peace." The last stand is now the discretionary executive embargo.

POWER TO MAKE WAR

If they get it, their victory will be complete. It will not even be necessary to go through Geneva. With this power in executive hands, a full opportunity is available to put the United States into any foreign war at any time; and we may be sure, if this power were given, not only that those who now urge executive discretion as a means of ending neutrality would exert every influence to bring the United States to the support of the cause with which they sympathized but also that they would be powerfully aided in this effort by all the agencies of alien interest.

Arthur Krock, in the New York Times of December 31, correctly interpreted the case for discretionary power to apply selective commodity embargoes as a conscious demand for the executive power to be unneutral whenever unneutrality seems desirable.

Mr. Krock says that "it should always be remembered that those who want neutrality believe in the thing called neutrality." He adds that he, for one, does not believe it possible for the United States to attain neutrality in a modern world. He argues that the view of neutrality of those who oppose the discretionary embargo "is built on the hopes that strict neutrality is possible even though it is merely technical." He says, "There is no such thing as neutrality", and he therefore advocates an executive discretion in applying embargoes "so that unneutrality (in effect) may be wisely directed." He wants this executive power in order that the Executive may "use measures to shorten and concentrate that (foreign) war as the surest path to noninvolvement. Any effective discretion which might cancel an advantage held by belligerents hostile to democratic freedom would be incidental, not objective."

RETALIATORY MEASURES

Embargoes are not friendly but hostile in their nature. Many of the instances indiscriminately cited by Justice Sutherland in his sweeping opinion in the Curtiss-Wright case related not to the maintenance of our own neutrality but to retaliatory or punitive measures, such as embargoes and nonintercourse, to insure respect for our neutral rights from foreign belligerents. They contemplated hostile action in a specific foreign conflict, as in the case of the limited war with France, 1798–1800, and under such circumstances the President's hands, as in a declared war, should not be tied. But we are now purporting to remain neutral, not to wage war. It is therefore incongruous to vest war-making power in the Executive or to modify our commercial treaties so as to leave the way open to the exercise of acts of coercion.

It seems clear that the power to act unneutrally is the war-making power and that Congress not only should not but cannot constitutionally transfer that power to the President. The current "discretionary neutrality" bill is a war-making bill, and the issue should be discussed on that basis.

Our one attempt to make the world safe for democracy proved a rather ghastly failure. Now we are invited to make another. The attempt to extinguish aggressors by coercion—perhaps another name for the same policy—has had an equal lack of success. Yet in the name of the discretionary embargo power we are invited again to take the plunge and help the "peace-loving nations" defeat the "aggressors." We seem to be trying to prove that Spengler was right when he said that the Western World was hastening its own destruction.

EDWIN BORCHARD.

YALE UNIVERSITY, February 2, 1937.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I should like to ask the Senator, to what provision in the joint resolution does he refer when he says that it gives the President the power to make war without declaration by Congress?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The unlimited discretion that is given him to determine as to all articles of contraband, noncontraband, and the like.

Mr. ROBINSON. But that discretion is accorded for the express purpose of maintaining the peace. The President can only take that action, he can only issue an embargo, he can only prescribe what articles shall not be carried, if he finds that such action will promote the peace of the United States. Manifestly, it is not intended to give him war-making power. It is intended to broaden the authority, or rather to make definite his authority, for the purpose of preserving the peace.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It is not intended to authorize anything of the sort. It may do it, and the use of the power can readily be seen to be such as Mr. MOORE contends for.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is it any more likely to involve the country in war for the President, if he finds that it will tend to keep us at peace, to specify articles of contraband which shall not be carried than it is to declare an embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes; because the embargo was impartial. The very essence of an embargo is its impartiality. It will be recalled that the provision with respect to embargo which we will pass here was not passed at one time because the President would not accept it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; but, if the Senator will pardon me, if I understand the theory advanced by Mr. John Bassett Moore, whose article the Senator has quoted to support his argument, it is that any imposition of a restriction on the commerce which international law recognizes as lawful constitutes an unneutral and unfriendly act. So that the principle would apply to an embargo on munitions as well as a restriction on other materials.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. No; I do not so understand it.

Let me now read from a letter written by John Bassett Moore to Representative HAMILTON FISH on the bill that was pending in the House, but the reasoning is the same, so far as the pending joint resolution is concerned:

You are correct in saying that, so far as concerns the proposed surrender by Congress of its exclusive constitutional power to declare war, they for the most part in no respect differ from the measures introduced a year ago to empower the President, in his uncontrolled discretion, to engage in war and carry it on without the prior declaration which our fundamental law requires. To seek to save appearances by using in the title phrases such as "to maintain the neutrality of the United States", or to "promote peace", is at best a form of self-deception of the most delusive and unsubstantial kind.

No one who wished unlimited power to make war could ask for more than the authority, in his own discretion, to impose and revoke and to modify and adjust embargoes upon our foreign commerce. Not only are such embargoes never contemplated as friendly measures but they are radically inconsistent with the avowed theory of the present administration that existing commercial restrictions constitute the chief menace to peace.

There is more of like character, but I shall not take the time to read it. I ask that the entire letter be printed in the RECORD at this point as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of Feb. 18, 1937]

JOHN BASSETT MOORE'S LETTER ON NEUTRALITY PLANS

WASHINGTON, February 17.—The text of the letter written by John Bassett Moore to Representative HAMILTON FISH, of New York, ranking Republican member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, on the subject of discretionary power to be vested in the President by neutrality legislation follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., February 12, 1937.

DEAR MR. FISH: My delay in answering your letter of February 5 has been unavoidable.

It would not be possible for me to appear before any of the committees in relation to the so-called neutrality measures lately introduced in Congress, even if I had not fully expressed myself upon them in letters and statements submitted in writing heretofore.

You are correct in saying that, so far as concerns the proposed surrender by Congress of its exclusive constitutional power to declare war, they for the most part in no respect differ from the measures introduced a year ago to empower the President, in his uncontrolled discretion, to engage in war and carry it on without the prior declaration which our fundamental law requires. To seek to save appearances by using in the title phrases such as "to maintain the neutrality of the United States" or to "promote peace" is at best a form of self-deception of the most delusive and unsubstantial kind.

SEES WAR POWER IN EMBARGOES

No one who wished unlimited power to make war could ask for more than the authority, in his own discretion, to impose and revoke and to modify and adjust embargoes upon our foreign commerce. Not only are such embargoes never contemplated as friendly measures, but they are radically inconsistent with the avowed theory of the present administration that existing commercial restrictions constitute the chief menace to peace.

In the recent decision of the Supreme Court, sustaining the embargo imposed by the President, under an act of Congress, on the shipment of airplanes to the belligerents in the Chaco war, various statutory authorizations to impose embargoes or commercial nonintercourse were promiscuously cited, without any analysis of the circumstances under which it was done or any attempt to ascertain whether the object was friendly or unfriendly, conciliatory, or coercive; and it has in consequence been hastily and inconsiderately assumed that such things might be, "and overcome us like a summer's cloud", without creating "special wonder" or any feeling of displeasure or resentment. Unfortunately, however, this view is as erroneous as it is superficial.

Writers on international law, in treating of international processes, classify them as amicable and nonamicable. Among the former are negotiations, good offices, mediation, and arbitration. Nonamicable processes are divided into two classes—those short of war and war itself.

Those short of war embrace withdrawal of diplomatic relations, retortion of retaliation, and the display of force, these three being progressively coercive in their nature and intention. After those come reprisals, "pacific" blockade, embargo, and nonintercourse.

HELD "ESSENTIALLY COERCIVE"

In describing these measures as being "short of war", it is not meant that they may not involve acts of war. What is actually meant is that, if not opposed, they may not result in the legal condition of things called a state of war. But, as they are essentially coercive in their nature, experience has shown that they are likely to result in an avowed state of war.

As all history shows, wars have, for the most part, grown out of forcible or coercive acts committed before the legal condition of things called a state of war, formally declared, came into existence.

Therefore, to commit to the Executive the power in his discretion to adopt and prosecute measures that naturally lead to war is virtually to transfer to him the power to make war, so that the formal declaration by Congress of the existence of a state of war would become an essentially perfunctory act.

In recent discussions of the subject of neutrality I have observed two fundamental misconceptions.

The first of these is that neutrality is an adjustable thing, which is to be changed from day to day according to changing conditions. No explanation has been made of what this means. No practical illustrations or examples have been confided to us. Apparently everything is to be left to an occult executive omniscience, which it would be unbecoming and unnatural for parliamentary bodies either to claim or to question.

CALLS CONCEPTION VISIONARY

But the entire conception is visionary and unsound. It is of the very essence of law that its rules should be fixed and certain, and especially is this the case with the law of neutrality. The administration of neutrality must be viewed both objectively and subjectively.

With no fixed and certain rules to guide it, not only would a professedly neutral government be susceptible to the fluctuations of sentiment at home, but its acts would inevitably be open to suspicion by all the governments at war, each interpreting them according to their effect upon its own fortunes. Nothing could more surely tend to involve us in war.

Belligerents, moreover, have the right definitely to know the conditions which they are to meet. They cannot be expected to submit to measures of an occasional shifting or haphazard kind.

The rules of neutrality, as they now stand, have been of gradual growth, and embody the results of experience. Heretofore the United States has made important contributions to their development. It would be against the interests of the world, as well as against our own interests, to substitute for the definiteness and certainty of the law as it now stands a blank charter to juggle with unforeseen conditions as they may arise.

RECALLS WILSONIAN NEUTRALITY

The second fundamental misconception by which recent discussions have been pervaded is the supposition that the United States became involved in the late war through the effort to assert and defend its rights as a neutral, and that if we would keep out of foreign wars we must abandon those rights. These assumptions are contrary to the fact.

The more the evidence is disclosed and examined the clearer it becomes that the United States, while from time to time protesting against belligerent interference with its trade, had no intention to resist such interference by measures of coercion; while, on the other hand, it asserted, as against certain powers, rights never before claimed by a neutral government.

In saying this I particularly have in mind the treatment of belligerent armed merchantmen as peaceful ships. This was contrary to all precedent, and also to the well-settled law as long before declared by our highest judicial authorities. Never before had a government professing to be neutral undertaken to guarantee the safety of the armed ships of a belligerent against enemy attack.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I have said that the joint resolution makes us the ally of Great Britain in the Atlantic and of Japan in the Pacific. That is so obvious that it ought not to require any elucidation whatsoever. In the Atlantic the one power which has the fleet and the power to control the seas is Great Britain; and Great Britain could come here and ask for all the supplies she desired, all the shipping of every sort and character she might want, and she could go away with it assured of the fact that her Navy was sufficient to protect it as it convoyed it across the ocean. Great Britain, and Great Britain alone, is in this joint resolution; and that is not alone my opinion, but is the opinion of many of the persons whose particular articles I have before me.

I have before me an article written by Edwin L. James. He is the foreign correspondent of the New York Times. I happen to know the gentleman; and, while he and I disagree on the fundamental ideas relating to foreign nations, yet I know him to be a man of very great parts indeed, who has been a correspondent of the New York Times in Europe for many years, and who writes with a knowledge of his subjects. He says:

When Mr. Runciman recently conferred with President Roosevelt it was reported that he left Washington feeling he had assurances that our neutrality plans would not work to the disadvantage of the British. That has been diplomatically denied. But certainly he should not have had cause to worry. The new neutrality plans indicate, in practice, a cooperation between the United States and Great Britain which the most ardent Anglophiles in this country would not have dreamed possible a few short years ago.

If there is a European war in which Britain is involved, Britain and those nations on her side which have the money to pay can come and get supplies in this country. Those nations against which Britain would be fighting would not be able to do so. Thus the cash-and-carry plan of our neutrality legislation will have done away with neutrality except in theory.

It may be argued, of course, that in the event of a war between Britain and Germany, Germany would not have the money to buy on the cash-and-carry plan anywhere. That may well be true, but certainly Downing Street will have no regrets over the prospect of a nonrecurrence of the most disagreeable diplomatic exchanges between London and Washington which caused such strained relations in the first years of the last Great War. In other words, Britain will not have to worry about facing the only navy which could give her navy any serious trouble.

There are those who may see a good development in the prospect of the American democracy giving aid to Britain, or Britain and France, in what many see as a coming conflict between the forces of democracy and fascism in Europe. But it is doubtful if the authors of the pending neutrality bills have calculated on this basis.

However, since Britain and France are among our biggest peacetime customers, it may well be that there will evolve a distinct gain for our commerce in shaping our neutrality plans in a way which would permit them to trade with us in wartime. Were London and Paris to feel that when at war they could get, for example, no cotton from the United States, that might well lead them, before war started, to cultivate sources of cotton in other countries, to the disadvantage of the United States. The same would apply to a long list of other commodities exported normally by this country.

But since our cash-and-carry plan would make us the best source of needed raw materials for the country with the money to pay for them, with the ships to carry them, and the navy to guard their passage—as well as for that country's allies—the whole business may work out to the satisfaction of London and Washington.

Such is neutrality!

Mr. President, I brought with me a great many excerpts from different newspapers dealing with the pending joint resolution. I thought first I would call the various writers as witnesses in the presentation of this matter, but it would take too much time; so I have selected one or two and left the rest behind.

Dorothy Thompson has written an article in which she says:

Now what does this bill actually mean in practice? First of all, it means that we are flagrantly reversing the attitude expressed in the Kellogg Pact which denounces aggression. We, the greatest, strongest, single nation on earth, announce by inference that there is no such thing as "right" or "wrong" and no such thing as international morality. In advance of all possible hostility we perform the greatest Pontius Pilot act in history.

But then we qualify that stand of dubious morality. We say that we will sell goods to anybody who can come and get them. That will mean in practice that we will sell goods to anybody who can control the high seas. That means, in the field of realistic politics, that as matters stand today, we will sell goods to Great Britain. Tomorrow, perhaps Germany and Russia will make a great combination, build tremendous navies, and set out to conquer the world; anything at all is possible.

* * * * * * *

Under this bill the President can prevent John Smith, who has a single oil well in Texas, from selling oil to Spain, or Russia, or Great Britain, or any other country which happens to be engaged at any moment in war, but he cannot prevent the great American oil companies, with fields and refineries all over the world—in Persia, Mexico, Venezuela, the Dutch East Indies, or in Rumania—from selling oil to any one they please, and making tremendous profits, with which to come home from the wars and force the little fellows, whom the war has impoverished, into bankruptcy. Under this bill International Nickel, which is incorporated in Canada, but has a huge majority of American capital, can do all the business it likes. So, for instance, can Anaconda Copper.

* * * * * * *

We can tie up our hands all we please, in an attempt to predicate the next war on the history of the last, a history, incidentally, which recent interpretations have both clarified and befuddled. But whatever we do will generate counter-politics in other countries. They are not althogether stupid; they are also motivated by self-interest.

The bill is badly named. It should be called: An act to encourage autarchy, declare our alliance with whomever at the moment has the biggest navy, and foster international finance capitalism at the cost of the small fellows at home.

I do not desire to trespass upon the time of any other Senator by occupying too much time in discussing this subject, but I submit to the Senate that this measure is little understood. Ask yourselves, Senators, how well it is understood? It is little understood and, for that reason, it ought not to be hastily passed. We are in no mood to pass the joint resolution or act upon it today; we are in no mood to deal with a subject of such great importance as this in the brief time that we have to deal with it. There is another question before us. I need not advert to it because all Members of the Senate understand what it is. Each man here is thinking of that; his mind is filled with it and, of course, it should be, because it is a great and important subject; but, with that great subject before us, it is not wise for us to deal with this measure on this day or on succeeding days when we are not prepared. All who are not familiar with the joint resolution ought to read it; they ought to be familiar with the possibilities contained within it; they ought to know that it is a measure which, while we will say it is designed for peace, will not give us peace but will make us contemptible before the world.

Mr. President, just a further word in passing. I know that it is of little use to talk of the traditions of America or of what they have meant. I have passed the proscribed age, so I feel I am at liberty to do so, but I know that to do so leaves one in a situation in which it will be said he thinks in terms of some years ago. However, you can all recall historically that when we were little, when we had naught to think of but our own advancement—and that was very slow—we took our stand before the world on this question; we maintained that stand from that day until recent years, and never, in any degree, indicated that we had altered our position upon that stand. But now, when we have become flabby and great we are to do—what? We are to send other people upon the seas with their vessels filled with our goods, and then, like hypocrites, we will stand aside and say, "We take none of the blame or responsibility." We will let them go, but the loss of life, if loss of life shall occur, will be just as great in one instance as in another. There can be sent in American bottoms the goods bought by people from beyond the seas, and they can be sent, probably, with American crews and such American crews will suffer the perils and the dangers which under international law inhere to the carrying of goods in time of war.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that American crews, citizens of the United States, cannot be on a British vessel.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Wait a moment. They may be on American bottoms, may they not?

Mr. PITTMAN. They may be on American bottoms.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Then what difference will it make? The cynical response of the Senator is that Americans cannot be killed, but the citizens of other countries may be killed, and they are human beings after all. Whichever they be, and whether we send American crews in American bottoms or citizens of some other nation on our ships—I do not know how that would be accomplished, but we will say that it could be—then the dangers to which they would be put would be the like dangers in any event.

Mr. PITTMAN. That would depend on whether or not the President should use the power under subsection (a), section 2 to prevent American ships carrying goods thereby threatening the lives of Americans on board.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Why is it proposed to give him that power?

Mr. PITTMAN. Because of the lives of the seamen on board, which is the subject to which the Senator is referring.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Why is it not attended to in the joint resolution itself?

Mr. PITTMAN. It is attended to in the joint resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Why is the President given the discretion?

Mr. PITTMAN. If, for instance, there should not be submarine warfare such as prevailed in the last war by reason of not arming our ships, the submarines, by reason of our not arming our ships, would carry out the customary law of nations in regard to visit and search. In such circumstances, while the cargo of the vessels could be confiscated or destroyed, the lives of the seamen would be preserved.

In that event we would not need subsection (a), giving the President the power of restricting or preventing shipments to belligerents on American ships; but if the belligerent nations pursued the course followed during the World War of sinking all vessels, neutral and otherwise, then to save the lives of our citizens and to prevent the destruction of their property in the war zone, such as occurred in 1917, it might be necessary for him to prohibit American shippers carrying to a belligerent what was declared to be contraband of war.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I yield.

Mr. BONE. The Senator has adverted to a matter which I have attempted to reach by an amendment which I think is on the Senator's desk. I wonder if he would care at this point to comment on the force of the amendment which I have tendered?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I do not know what the amendment is.

Mr. BONE. It is on page 10, line 13, after the word "thereunder", where certain language is suggested to be inserted.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I note that the words to be inserted are "or by the owner of the vessel carrying the same." Will the Senator tell me what that means?

Mr. BONE. It reaches the very matter the Senator has suggested. It will be possible under the joint resolution to ship a half a million dollar cargo in an American vessel resulting in a very peculiar situation arising. By the terms of the pending measure we compel an American to separate himself from title to the cargo and to become divorced from it. That cargo goes out on the high seas into the ocean lanes, and is, we will say, the property of Great Britain. Great Britain is at war with Germany; the property on the high seas is the property of British nationals, but it is being carried in an American bottom, perhaps, worth 20 times what the cargo is worth. Every submarine, every wolf of the sea, would be after that cargo because it is contraband and belongs to its enemy, and they might very readily sink the American cargo and the American crew, and the American officers on an American vessel flying the American flag at the masthead. The purpose is to say to the American shipper that he has no more protection in going into that kind of trade and carrying that cargo. The amendment addresses itself directly to the matter the Senator was suggesting.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The Senator says an American skipper and American seamen would be in charge of such a ship?

Mr. BONE. Under the section of the joint resolution which I seek to reach by the amendment, it would be possible for a cargo the title of which the American has divorced himself to be carried to a particular country on a ship flying the American flag and owned by Americans. Therefore, while the cargo would be no longer an American cargo, the ship would be owned by Americans.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Manned by American sailors?

Mr. BONE. The ship would be operated by American sailors and would be owned by Americans.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That is what I said a few moments ago, and that is the point upon which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] took me up.

Mr. BONE. I cannot imagine any greater temptation to a belligerent to attack and endeavor to sink a vessel than to know that the property of the enemy constituted its whole cargo. That is why I made this suggestion in the form of an amendment, because I think it much more essential to remove from the zone of warlike operations $10,000,000 worth of American property in the form of a vessel than it is to remove $500,000 worth of property in the form of cargo.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I would be for the amendment, because I am for any amendment and all amendments, no matter what they are. [Laughter.]

Mr. BONE. I could not share the Senator's ambition in that direction, but I hope the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] will have no great objection to my amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, Japan would be in the same position in the Pacific that Great Britain would be on the Atlantic. Suppose Japan and Russia should come to grips. We read all the time about the possibility of such a happening. The great source of war material would be our Pacific coast. Who can come there? Russia has no merchant marine, except in a very limited degree. Japan could come here, and we could sell to Japan. We would sell to her everything she needed and everything she wanted, and then we would go and hide.

This joint resolution is a terrible measure, in my opinion. I think it is awful, and it ought not to be passed.

Mr. President, I have taken enough of the Senate's time. With the years I grow to love my country more. With the years I grow to think less of my country's enemies. I want peace. I am particularly anxious that we should have peace in this country, and anything that I can do I would do to that end; but I do not want peace at the price of every bit of honor our country may have, nor do I want a wholly illusory peace. I do not want peace under the guise of something that will deprive our people of their legitimate rights and will not bring peace.

I might stretch my faith so far as to permit myself to vote for a measure of this sort if I really thought it would bring peace, but it will not bring peace and it cannot bring peace. The idea that our friends on the other side of the aisle have—an ideal with which I am in full sympathy—will not see its fulfillment. We are in the situation today where we cannot pass this measure and feel the same as we felt before. No other nation ties itself in a strait jacket thus. No other nation says in advance exactly what it is going to do. No other nation on the face of the earth insists that it shall tie its hands in relation to its ocean-borne commerce. All nations seek and covet such commerce. All nations spend what time they can and what effort they may in obtaining ocean-borne commerce. It is the lifeblood of the nation which abuts the sea. If we tie our hands in advance by a law the ultimate of which no living soul can determine, but which we know will give two nations the advantage of an alliance with us, we have simply placed our country in a situation from which it cannot extricate itself.

I am sorry, Mr. President. I shall not talk longer upon the subject, but I feel deeply upon it, and feeling deeply, I leave with the Senate its determination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWELLENBACH in the chair). The Chair calls the attention of Senators to the fact that the Senate is now operating under the unanimous-consent agreement entered into yesterday, which provides that no Senator may speak longer than 30 minutes nor more than once on the joint resolution, nor longer than 15 minutes or more than once on any amendment.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I intend to support the pending joint resolution, the so-called neutrality or peace resolution, substantially as it was reported by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

I am supporting the measure because I want to do everything in my power, and I want Congress to do everything in its power, to keep the United States out of other peoples' wars. I believe the pending proposal is a desirable and practical step in that direction. I believe it will aid in bringing peace to the world.

I do not want to see our boys sent overseas again to risk, many of them to lose, their lives in a war over European controversies in which we have no real interest. I shall never vote to send American boys and young men overseas to fight other nations' battles.

But I realize that it is not sufficient merely to declare that in the future we will not allow ourselves to become involved in wars of another nation. It is necessary that we take positive steps now, before such a world war as is anticipated actually breaks, to eliminate as many as possible of the causes that might lead us into such a conflict.

I think we may as well realize that in future wars of any magnitude belligerent nations will not recognize the rights of any neutrals if those neutral rights might endanger the success of their own arms.

Mr. President, we may as well face the fact that in a war of any magnitude there is no recognition by belligerent nations of any such thing as international law. We learned this to our cost during the World War. In that war we desired to remain neutral. We believed that international law entitled us as neutrals to the freedom of the seas. We found out differently early in the war. The Allies brutally disregarded our rights as neutrals. Germany flagrantly disregarded our rights as neutrals.

Any rights we might have as neutrals to trade with other neutrals or with belligerent nations, if such trade required us to pass through whatever any belligerent nation might designate as a war zone—any such neutral rights as we might claim could be made effective only by we ourselves going to war to protect those rights.

I believe in facing this situation realistically, bearing always in mind that we desire not to be drawn into other peoples' wars, nor do we intend to be engulfed any more than is unavoidable in the economic disaster that another great war will bring upon the civilized world.

It is my belief if we face facts and realities on this question we will find that if we insist upon our rights to trade with belligerent nations, whether directly or indirectly through trading with neutral nations and having goods transshipped, we will be forced into that war.

Mr. President, I believe it to be a fact that if we sell munitions of war and war supplies to a belligerent nation, if the purchases are of any magnitude, we will have to finance those purchases. Then if the nation whose war we are financing faces defeat, we probably will feel obliged to intervene as an ally to insure that nation's victory.

In theory, of course, we would sell to both sides. But we know in fact that in a world war we could trade largely with only one side. In any kind of a prolonged struggle trading with the nation or nations on one side would almost inevitably compel us finally to become that nation's or those nations' allies and send our men and ships and treasures overseas to insure their victory.

Furthermore, if our ships and our citizens carry merchandise into the war zone, no matter for whom intended, it is just a question of a short time in any major war until some ships will be seized, others will be sunk, American lives will be lost; and that will drag us into the war.

For these reasons, in addition to my hatred of war as futile, brutal, degrading, and costly beyond all reason, I have felt for some time that this country should formulate in peacetime a definite foreign policy that would tend to isolate us from the next world war insofar as that is humanly possible.

The pending resolution, the Peace Act of 1937, seems to me to go a long way in that direction. It does not guarantee that we shall be able to keep ourselves out of the next mad world maelstrom of war, but, on the other hand, it does give promise that we shall not be inevitably drawn into that maelstrom through the lure of illusory war profits.

This resolution, I will admit, starts the United States on a new neutrality policy. That is what we want. The policies we have been following have led us, and would lead us again, into wars in which we should never be compelled to engage. So I say it is a point in its favor that the Peace Act of 1937 lays down a new neutrality policy, a peace policy, if you please, for the United States and the people of the United States.

Others have discussed and will discuss the provisions and implications of the Peace Act of 1937 as provided in the pending resolution. Before closing my own statement I desire to state briefly what I consider the more important provisions in the interest of our own peace as I understand them.

Essentially, this resolution carries the following provisions:

First. Mandatory embargo against the sale or shipment of arms, ammunition, and munitions of war to any belligerent nation or any faction in a civil strife of such size as to imperil the peace of the United States if we trade in munitions of war.

Second. Mandatory embargo against all loans and credits to belligerents, except that the President may, in his discretion, permit such short-term commercial credits as are used normally in peacetimes.

Third. Mandatory prohibition of any American vessel carrying arms and ammunition or munitions of war into any belligerent port or destined for any belligerent.

Fourth. Mandatory prohibition of American citizens traveling on vessels or planes of belligerents. This means that those who do will lose all right to the protection of the United States Government.

Fifth. Mandatory prohibition of arming American merchant ships that enter the war zone or enter belligerent ports. The reason for this is that the advent of the submarine means that all nations will regard armed merchant vessels as armed with offensive weapons, and subject to being sunk without warning.

Sixth. The so-called cash-and-carry plan, which I favor, for selling supplies other than war supplies to belligerents.

Briefly, this means that if a warring nation wants to buy ordinary goods and commodities in the United States, it may do so by paying cash in the United States and then transporting the goods on other than American vessels. It is mandatory that complete title be passed to the foreign purchaser before the goods can clear an American port.

Of course, there are other provisions of the measure that are important. The President is given discretionary power to add to the list of war supplies which it is prohibited to export at all to a belligerent. Armed merchantmen of belligerents, as well as submarines, are barred from American ports during wartime, except under such regulations as the President deems necessary.

Mr. President, I hope this joint resolution will be enacted. I want to see the important provisions of the joint resolution made the permanent law of the land. It may not be a perfect law, but is so much better than anything we have ever had before to protect us against foreign embroilments that I say it should be enacted speedily and without material amendment.

Mr. President, I believe I speak the sentiment of the great majority of our people when I say this. I know that is the sentiment of the people of my State of Kansas and of our section of the country.

In this connection, I ask to have printed, at the conclusion of, and as a part of, these remarks, a communication from the Peace Study Club, of Tecumseh, Kans. The membership of this organization is made up of rural people. This communication, I believe, represents in a general way the sentiments of our Great Plains people on war. It will be noted that they also want to draft property and wealth, as well as men, if we do go into another war. Also, they want the right to vote whether or not this Nation ever again shall engage in a foreign war. I am in agreement with both of those proposals. I ask unanimous consent to have this letter printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

TECUMSEH, KANS., February 23, 1937.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Peace Study Club of Tecumseh submits for your consideration the following program for peace legislation. We have considered every point carefully and feel that such laws are altogether reasonable and should be passed by this session of the Congress. Warned by you in one of your radio speeches last fall that peace legislation that would be really effective would be opposed by those whose interests are in war, we have been trying to spread the word as far as possible among other clubs and organizations, that it is important that the people themselves get behind and support their Representatives in Congress. We shall watch with interest the activity of Congress with regard to peace legislation.

For peace legislation: Laws to—

I. Prohibit loans of money or credit by the United States or by citizens of the United States to foreign governments or groups at war, or for war purposes.

II. Prohibit sale or shipment, directly or indirectly, of arms or munitions to any warring nation or group.

III. Prohibit Government protection of:

1. Sale or shipments of arms or munitions to any foreign nation at any time.

2. Any trade with warring countries, directly or indirectly, or in war zones.

3. Private investments in foreign countries.

4. Citizens of the United States traveling on ships or planes of foreign countries engaged in war, or in war zones, or traveling or residing in countries at war or where war is imminent.

IV. Provide for the draft of needed material, money, and industry, as well as men, in case of war.

V. Provide that should the entrance of the United States into foreign war be in question, a vote of the people of the United States be taken on the question, and that Congress shall receive the return of this vote before it acts on a declaration of war.

VI. Provide that no law shall be interpreted to restrain the United States from acting to support the Monroe Doctrine in the interest of the American hemisphere.

You will recognize some of your own proposals in our program for peace legislation. In our study of peace and war we have tried to consider all the conditions that work together to bring about war, and have constructed our program accordingly.

I'm sure you will remember Tecumseh, east of Topeka. We meet in the hall that you helped us dedicate about 8 years ago.

Yours very respectfully,

(Mrs.) KATE WERNER,
President, Tecumseh Peace Study Club.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I think the farm folk of this country are overwhelmingly in favor of legislation of the character embodied in the pending joint resolution. I offer for the RECORD, and ask to have printed, resolutions adopted at the seventieth annual session of the National Grange at Columbus, Ohio, on November 11, 1936.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolutions will be printed in the RECORD.

The resolutions are as follows:

WORLD PEACE

We earnestly advocate that the Government of the United States continue to exert every effort to promote peace and good will among nations. Since disarmament on a purely national basis is not practicable, we cherish the hope that our Government may use its best endeavors to bring about reduction in armaments on an international scale.

We favor a sound neutrality policy that will save America from becoming entangled in foreign wars of greed, hatred, and aggression, and which are of no direct concern to us.

We reaffirm our position in favor of taking the profits out of war. In the event of future armed conflict, wealth as well as manpower should be conscripted. The manufacture of armaments and munitions for national defense should be taken over by the Government in time of war.

Mr. CAPPER. I ask also to have printed in the RECORD a resolution for world peace legislation adopted at the sixty-sixth annual meeting of the Kansas State Board of Agriculture at Topeka, Kans., January 15 of this year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution is as follows:

WORLD PEACE

World peace is a dream that we most devoutly wish might come true and we encourage all efforts leading to that happy realization. Meantime we urge the strictest neutrality on the part of the United States during periods of war and controversies arising among foreign countries.

Mr. CAPPER. I ask also to have printed in the RECORD resolutions adopted at the thirty-second annual convention of the National Farmers' Union at Des Moines, Iowa, November 17, 1936, in favor of legislation of the character embodied in the pending joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution is as follows:

WAR

War is an utter negation of civilization. It is a relic of barbarism, regimenting mankind in organized murder, starvation, disease, and destruction. It is incompatible with every moral and Christian teaching.

Throughout the entire blood-drenched history of mankind, each succeeding war has proven nothing but its own futility.

Wars in the past have left a terrific toll of suffering and destruction. Wars in the future, with the rapid development through science and invention of more devastating and far-reaching death-dealing devices, threaten to completely destroy civilization.

At the base of practically every war is the profit motive, the desire of a few to profit, even though such profits are coined out of the blood of those who die in the madness of international slaughter. The profit system, with its callous disregard for human life and happiness and its promotion of suspicion, fear, and jealousy, encourages and promotes war. Peace and security are attainable only through a replacement of the profit system by a system based on the principles of cooperation. With these facts in mind, we the members of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, make the following declaration:

1. Europe again stands on the threshold of war. The hates and jealousies engendered by past wars threaten to engulf the entire world.

We therefore recommend that present neutrality legislation be continued and further strengthened and that every possible precaution be taken to prevent our entrance in any future war.

2. All history proves that huge armaments have never been a safeguard for peace. Rather they have fostered fear and suspicion that leads to war.

We therefore condemn the excessive appropriations now being spent to build a huge military and naval machine, a machine which is out of all proportions to our needs for defense against invasion, and by its undemocratic traditions threatens our civil liberties and our democratic institutions.

The funds used for excessive war preparations could better be used to rebuild a country still suffering from the effects of the last war.

3. Compulsory military training is foreign to every tradition of the American people. It is undemocratic and un-American by every principle and tradition in the history of the United States.

We condemn in present efforts to extend compulsory military training into the public high schools, and we recommend the complete abolition of compulsory military training in any publicly supported educational institution.

4. The desire for profit on the part of private munitions manufacturers promotes competitive armaments and fosters fears and suspicions that lead to war.

We therefore recommend that the private manufacturer of the instruments of war be abolished and that the Government take over and operate the munitions industry.

5. The best safeguard against war is free discussion. We therefore condemn the war dictatorship bills and every other measure designed to nullify the traditional American liberties of free speech, free press, and free assembly.

6. The hates and jealousies born of past wars must be removed if peace is to be preserved.

We therefore approve all efforts toward international arbitration of disputes, but we condemn any alliances that may involve us in wars which are not of our making and are foreign to our interests.

7. We point to the International Cooperative Alliance as the best example of peaceful relations between nations.

We reaffirm our faith in the cooperative movement and cooperative education as the best solution of the economic problems that lead to war.

8. We further recommend that in the event of war, wealth and property should be conscripted and paid on the same basis as human beings are conscripted and paid.

Mr. CAPPER. I ask also to have printed in the RECORD a resolution on the same subject adopted at the Eighteenth Annual Convention of the American Farm Bureau, December 11, 1936, at Pasadena, Calif.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution is as follows:

WORLD PEACE

The American Farm Bureau Federation commends the national administration for its aggressive efforts in behalf of good-neighbor relationships among the nations of the Americas, thus affording a good example to the other nations of the world. The farm men and women of America urge the continued diligent effort of our Government in behalf of world peace.

Mr. BONE obtained the floor.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. I yield.

Mr. POPE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Clark	Lee	Pepper
Andrews	Copeland	Lodge	Pittman
Ashurst	Davis	Logan	Pope
Austin	Dieterich	Lonergan	Radcliffe
Bachman	Ellender	Lundeen	Robinson
Bailey	Frazier	McAdoo	Russell
Barkley	George	McCarran	Schwartz
Black	Gerry	McGill	Schwellenbach
Bone	Gillette	McKellar	Sheppard
Borah	Green	McNary	Smith
Bridges	Hale	Maloney	Stelwer
Brown, Mich.	Hatch	Minton	Thomas, Okla.
Brown, N. H.	Hayden	Moore	Thomas, Utah
Bulow	Herring	Murray	Townsend
Burke	Hitchcock	Neely	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Johnson, Calif.	Norris	Van Nuys
Capper	Johnson, Colo.	Nye	Walsh
Caraway	King	O'Mahoney	Wheeler
Chavez	La Follette	Overton	White

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GILLETTE in the chair). Seventy-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I direct the attention of the Senate to an amendment I have offered, which was printed, and now lies on the desks of Senators. The amendment affects that section of the joint resolution which appears on page 10 and the amendment is as follows: After the word "thereunder", in line 13, on page 10, I would by the amendment insert the words "or by the owner of the vessel carrying the same."

To begin with, I wish to explain the purpose of my proposal, because it has seemed to me that without the amendment we would not only achieve far less than the objective we seek, but we would actually thrust ourselves into a position where we would deliberately invite trouble. I hope I can make that aspect of the problem very plain.

By the terms of subsection (b) of section 2 of the joint resolution it is made unlawful to export any sort of commodities to any belligerent country unless and until the title to the commodities, goods, and merchandise has passed from American owners to some foreign owner.

Let us get the record perfectly plain, because when we vote on the pending measure the country is going to look coldly and objectively at our votes, and ask us what in the world we meant by removing a grave element of danger from one part of the property that is shipped, and wholly failing to remove it from another part, thereby injecting provocative factors into that sort of a shipment which may, and which will, in my judgment, surely lead us into serious complications with belligerent governments.

Let me present a hypothetical case for the consideration of Senators. I have examined the pending measure carefully. I am no mere captious critic of other men's work, because this joint resolution is a composite thing, and I think the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and his associates have done a good piece of work in putting the measure together, and I cannot bring myself to believe, nor should anyone infer from what I am saying that I believe, that there has been any intentional omission on their part; but I do think that perhaps they have failed to understand the grim significance which underlies this particular omission in the joint resolution.

Now to the hypothetical case which I desire to present to Senators. Let us assume a war is on between Great Britain and some other power, and I take Great Britain as an example because the British Empire has been mentioned here so many times—"Britain, the mistress of the seas." We will assume that Britain is in a war with Germany, Germany still without a navy, but with submarines, the so-called wolves of the sea, concerning which we have heard so much in years gone by.

A million-dollar cargo is assembled at an ocean gateway on the Atlantic seaboard. The owners of that property are told by this statute, if it shall become law, that they must divest themselves of title and separate themselves from any interest in the material, be it wheat, cotton, oil, corn, copper, or what not. The statute tells them that in the interest of neutrality and to preserve peace we will not allow Americans to send out onto the high seas any commodities which will surely attract these grey wolves of the sea, as a deer attracts a cougar out in my country. They are told that a shipment of wheat, cotton, oil, corn, copper, food of all kinds, means sustaining a belligerent power and the destruction of the sons of the country opposed to the belligerent to whom we are shipping that sort of material.

So this million-dollar cargo is loaded into a ship in New York and starts across the ocean to England. What happens? What will inevitably happen? Under this measure in its present form it would be possible, and I think wholly probable, that the cargo belonging to a belligerent would be shipped in an American bottom, in a Dollar liner, for instance, flying the American flag and under American registry. A $10,000,000 American ship is loaded with a $1,000,000 cargo belonging to Great Britain, a belligerent. That cargo by every rule of international law is contraband of war, and immediately becomes, and logically so, attractive spoils for German submarines.

The Germans know that if that cargo gets into a British port it will feed the British people and preserve their morale, and that is important, because the destruction of the morale of the civilian population is today quite as important an element of war as the destruction of the lives of the soldiers on the battle front, because the morale of the soldier will be wrecked if the morale of the people at home is destroyed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. I yield.

Mr. KING. In the hypothetical case which the Senator is suggesting for our consideration, is he assuming everything as contraband, food, and clothing, and like articles?

Mr. BONE. Yes; and in a moment I will get around to why I indulge the assumption. Whenever, under this bill, the British Government or British nationals, during a war between Germany and Great Britain, buys gasoline, oil, copper, wheat, or corn from an American, it is their property, and in that sense it is contraband; it is fair prey for German cruisers and German submarines, and the Germans would be idiotic not to attempt to seize it or destroy it. It is the property of their enemy; it is the food which will feed the soldier who is blasting out the lives of sons of German mothers, and the Germans would be less than human if they did not try to prevent such a cargo reaching a British port.

The cargo goes out in an American bottom, a million dollars' worth of British property, which we look upon with undisguised horror in the pending measure as a provocative factor tending to drag us into war, and we therefore remove it from the category of protected items of commerce. But if this bill shall be enacted, we will say to the German, "We thrust this cargo owned by Britain out onto the high seas but serve notice on you that the cargo is being carried in an American bottom, on a ship flying the American flag, with an American crew, and you will touch it at your peril. If you sink it, our national honor will be outraged."

Mr. President, I do not believe this is too harsh an indictment or too strong a statement of the possibilities of trouble growing out of the operation of this joint resolution, if this possibility of trouble is not now eliminated by the adoption of my amendment.

Of course, the Germans would regard such a cargo as legitimate prey; and why not? The cargo may be worth a million dollars, but the vessel itself is worth $10,000,000. In order to protect ourselves from the possibility of being plunged into war over a cargo we divorce ourselves from the million dollars, but by this joint resolution we would keep a firm grip on a $10,000,000 vessel and probably be plunged into war to protect it.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I am not a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, which prepared the joint resolution, but I have been deeply concerned with its provisions, and I am asking the Senator now regarding the case he has just assumed. Is not the discretionary power provided in section 2 (a) perhaps intended by the committee to cover such a situation as that which the Senator assumes?

Mr. BONE. It may be that the President, in the exercise of his discretion, could bar from American vessels every form of commodity; but read the language to which the able Senator from New Mexico has referred. In section 1 it is provided that the President, after issuing his proclamation as to the existence of a state of belligerency between nations, may place restrictions upon the shipment of "certain articles."

The thing I fear is that where we leave so important a matter to the discretion of the President, for whom, I may say, I entertain the highest respect and regard, and the purity of whose motives I would in nowise challenge, we would put too much power in the hands of one man. Congress itself, under the Constitution, alone has the power to declare war.

Imagine, Mr. President, what would happen if we relied only on that frail safeguard of so-called discretion. There is oil, for instance. We heard the rumpus raised when the Ethiopian embroglio was under way. Oil is the very lifeblood of the Nation in time of war. In case of a great European war, oil-producing groups in this country would be down here in Washington "putting the heat" on the President, if I may use that sort of a vulgarism—to exempt oil from the proscribed list. They would come down here and "put the heat" on every Member of Congress, and they would say, "Do not interfere with our shipping oil." Oil is just as dangerous as dynamite or T. N. T., for it is the life of certain operations.

For one, I believe it would be a fatal gesture to rely on such a power in the hands of the President. Again I repeat, I have the utmost confidence in him, but I would not subject any human being to the inexorable and unbearable political pressure that would be brought to bear by interests to save the vast profit in the shipment of oil or wheat or cotton or corn or anything else.

Every writer on this subject—and a great many of them have been referred to by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and other Senators in discussion on the floor—has suggested that we must not lay profane hands on that sacred cow called trade. How tender, how touching is their solicitude for trade. Imagine, with this flood of stuff being written about this subject today, what would happen when war comes on, and greedy men see a chance to become rich overnight! Some of our war traders would not care whether it meant the lives of American boys. Men in times past have been vulgar enough to translate the blood of boys into dollars. Somehow, by the alchemy of big business, war profiteers have been able to transmute every drop of blood that fell from a soldier boy's body into a dollar that clinked merrily into their cash registers.

Let me say one thing further about the legal effect of this amendment. After all, as a lawyer, that is what I am concerned with. As a Senator, I am wholly concerned with keeping boys from being used in our armed forces to protect traders whose traffic may bring about the utter destruction of our civilization. If my amendment goes into this joint resolution it means that the vessel which carries this cargo will occupy the same status as its cargo——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. BONE. I will speak on the bill. Assuming my $10,000,000 vessel to be the issue in this case, whenever that vessel sails, my amendment would withdraw from that vessel the protection that we have by this bill withdrawn from its cargo. It seems to me—and I desire to be perfectly charitable in presenting my viewpoint, because I realize there are honest differences of opinion in this body as well as all other bodies—it seems to me that we are doing a thing which is almost indefensible from the standpoint of logic when we think we have washed our hands of moral responsibility for doing things that may lead to war by withdrawing protection from the cargo and still asserting to the country and to the world that we will protect the vessel carrying it. The flag that flies behind the Vice President's desk there will still protect the vessel, which is worth 10 times as much as the cargo. And so the German submarine "wolves"—still using this hypothetical case—the submarines see a great $10,000,000 American vessel coming out of New York Harbor carrying a million-dollar British cargo, and every one of these gray undersea "wolves" will immediately be on its trail. A million dollars' worth of stuff in the hull of that boat belongs to Great Britain. Of course they are going to sink it if they can. You would not blame them.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. I yield.

Mr. POPE. Has the Senator any doubt that under section 2 (a) any President would issue a proclamation and prohibit any American vessel from carrying such cargo in times of war? Is there any doubt at all about that?

Mr. BONE. Oh, yes, Mr. President. That is why I am expressing my feeling in the fashion that I am. I have such a doubt. I once saw a President refuse to lift his hands at times when I think he should have lifted them. I think that so long as we freely allow the economic motives, the love of dollars, to have full sway, men will be vulgar enough to sell high and noble traditions for the sake of those dollars.

The language to which my good friend the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] calls my attention provides that the President may prevent any "such articles", that is, such articles as he might enumerate, from being carried on any American vessel.

I do not like those exceptions. I have no desire to indulge in any dalliance with that sort of loose language when we are trying to protect boys who will be dying in the next war. If our boys did not have to die, and if the American people did not have to have the lifeblood sweated out of them in taxation to pay for these crazy wars, I should not be on my feet speaking my protest here. If Americans want to carry this stuff, and indulge in a trade which is as dangerous as gun running and dope peddling so far as its moral effects on society are concerned, they should not ask protection which calls for the death of our boys who must underwrite the traffic with their lives. I think the shippers who get those flossy rates for carrying the cargo ought not to demand of their country the protection that its Army and its Navy will ultimately have to give them if we allow this traffic to go on under the protection of a statute which means the protection of our Navy. This, in turn, means war.

It has been suggested on this floor that profits are not touched by this resolution; but I wonder if the critics who approach us on that theory would be willing to vote for the bill which the Munitions Committee of the Senate introduced, which would take 99 percent of all profits after $10,000 profit is reached. If we could put that sort of legislation on the statute books, we probably should not have many shouters for war and our "sacred" trade rights, because the gentlemen who normally make money out of war could not cash in on the next one. War profits would become as extinct as the dodo.

It has been suggested also that if there should be another war in Europe, Great Britain would control the seas, and that any other nation at war with Great Britain, be it a small nation or a large nation, which did not dominate the seas by virtue of possession of a big navy, would be angry with us because we were not selling material freely to all nations and protecting that traffic by force if need be.

The answer to that assertion comes trippingly to the lips of a sophomore in high school. All we need do is to read the cold, ruthless pages of the history of the late war. Great Britain was not only mistress of the seas but Great Britain repeatedly seized our vessels on the high seas in violation of every canon and every standard of international law. Yet the British prate glibly of the sanctity of international law! I have yet to find a student of this subject who will not readily admit that international law and all its canons and its standards went into the ashcan when war was on.

Why spend precious hours splitting hairs like a lot of sophists of the Middle Ages over things that have no existence except in the imagination of some law shark? Everyone knows that international law did not amount to a damn in the last war.

Why talk of it? Why invoke it? It is as dead as Tophet. Yet, to hear some men talk about it, one would think they were talking about a sacred revelation from the Delphic oracle. But international law has proved to be a veritable Delphic oracle of Doodledum.

We asked, we begged, Great Britain to respect international law during the last war. Great Britain told us, in the chaste langauge of diplomacy, to "forget it." If we got into another war, and the sons of British mothers were dying on the battlefield, does any Senator think Britain would let any country with which she was at war get ammunition, food, clothing, or anything else from this country? Whether we pass a law or do not pass it, war is hell, and it is governed, in the last analysis, by the rules of the nether region.

Do Senators think that German mothers whose boys were dying under shells made by Bethlehem Steel or by any other American profiteer would in wartime stop to reason out what it meant in the field of international law, or respect our "traditional" freedom-of-seas notions, which became ashes in our mouth?

Suppose we were at war with Japan, and we had 2,000,000 boys on the Asiatic mainland, and the firm of Vickers, or Skoda, or Schneider-Creusot in France, were sending cargoes of arms to Japan, and the names of American boys day after day were appearing in the casualty lists, how long do you think it would be, sir, until American mothers would come down to Washington in one unending procession, saying, "We do not care anything about your sacred cow called international law; we want you to send the American Navy out to stop those boats, because our boys are dying under British or French shells"? And if we had the courage of yellow dogs we would send the American Navy out and stop that traffic, international law or no international law, or we should be unfit to live. The will to live is supreme.

I want someone here to name a belligerent nation in the World War that respected international law. I wish we would just quit being learned Thebans for once and be realistic and admit what we all know, and that is that people do not care anything about international law when their boys are dying on battlefields.

Sometimes I am reminded of Gulliver's Travels, when he arrived at some place where some fellows were transforming glistening ice into gunpowder. He was making fun of people for doing a lot of foolish things; yet nothing could be more foolish than that form of foolishness which is blind to the horrors that can be wrought by greed unleashed in time of national peril.

Great Britain even stopped our ships going to neutral ports, and we could have asserted another set of Alabama claims against her. Great Britain, our friend, our pal, our "buddy", to preserve whom we contributed an army of dead, was not above seizing our ships in defiance of international law. The British Empire, that prates all the time about international law, this nation that reverences and falls on its face before the shrine of international law, was not above being a highjacker of American cargoes that were going even into neutral ports, Scandinavian ports, Dutch ports. Great Britain sent her cruisers out and impounded them.

"Freedom of the seas." When I was a youngster at school I read about this noble doctrine. We had a great war over it, which was settled by the Treaty of Ghent, but there is not a line in that treaty about international law. Freedom of the seas! There was another great war followed by the Treaty of Versailles, which is barren of reference to this sacred cow—freedom of the seas.

If there shall be another war in Europe, does anybody honestly think that any nation over there will care what international law is or what its rules are? Belligerent nations are interested in international law just like a hog is interested in trigonometry. [Laughter.]

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. Yes.

Mr. FRAZIER. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington what he thinks the joint resolution, this so-called neutrality measure, would amount to in the event of a great world war? Would it be respected even in our own country?

Mr. BONE. When the machinery not only to operate the principle but effectively to control the principle is in our hands, of course, it will operate to the degree the joint resolution permits; but if I had my way, I would be willing to embargo every ounce of merchandise going to a belligerent country.

Mr. FRAZIER. I agree with the Senator from Washington. He has expressed my sentiments exactly.

Mr. BONE. I hear men everywhere, including the very people who write openly about this matter and always portray the hell of war and how unutterably horrible it is, say in the same breath, "For God's sake, do not lay rough hands on our trade; it is sacrosanct; it is sacred." It has become more sacred than the blood of the boys that will be shed in another war to protect this sacred cow. Our "rights"! We must prepare to fight for our "rights."

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. Yes.

Mr. POPE. Does the Senator think it would be possible to place an effective embargo upon our trade during war or at any other time? May I call his attention to the experience under the Jefferson administration in connection with the Embargo Act? An effort was then made to place an embargo upon our exports. That was in effect for about a year or a year and three months, and during that time there was turmoil in this country from one end to the other, there were petitions from cotton growers and wheat growers, there was idleness in our ports, and there was a continuous political battle here in the Senate and in the other House of Congress. Finally, at the end of a year and three months, the Embargo Act was repealed. In the meantime, there was a conference held, attended by Representatives of a number of the New England States that threatened to secede. Does the Senator think that it would be possible to have an effective embargo placed upon our exports at any time? Would not the administration in power be overthrown by the idleness, the unemployment, and the economic distress throughout the country? Does he think that an effective and complete embargo would be possible in this country without overturning our form of government?

Mr. BONE. I am a bit too cold-blooded and realistic to believe that everything could be embargoed; but, since that is not made an issue by the joint resolution, it presents a moot question. It may be that we love the dollars we get out of war more than we love peace. I am not concerned whether or not this is a neutrality measure. I am frank to say, Mr. President, that I am much more interested in preserving peace. I am tired of this juggling of words, this splitting of hairs over the meaning of something. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that it is quite probable that we could put an embargo on shipments of goods from this country; but we would have down here labor groups, farmers, and almost everybody else inveighing against such embargo laws and saying that they "hurt business."

But let us look at the other side of the picture for a moment. I tell it rather haltingly, but I hope every Senator will mull this over in his mind and see if he can find in his conscience any rational, horse-sense answer to this problem, other than the one I suggest. I think the greatest piece of opera bouffe, the greatest and most arrant fake and fraud on this earth, is the fake and fraud that we ourselves conjure up when we talk about our "profits" in trade and our sacred "rights" therein. Let us employ the lamp of experience to guide our footsteps and go back over the "primrose path of dalliance" with the evil which we indulged in 1914, 1915, and 1916, and see what happened.

Let us see whether or not these "rights" are worth anything; let us analyze them and see whether an American citizen whose boy may die for them thinks these "rights" are worth fighting for.

The war trade was a lovely thing; the cash was coming in; everybody was happy. Twelve billion dollars were borrowed by belligerent nations from us, and I suspect that some of our "big shots" are heartbroken that they could not at that time also lend money to Germany. As soon as the war was over, however, they started lending American money to Germany; the boys got action as quickly as they could. They made up for this lost opportunity a little later by lending Germany everything they could except their shirts.

Where did the Allies get that money from the United States and where did the United States get it? It was the proceeds of Liberty bonds. Who is paying those bonds? The American people. Every nickel of the $12,000,000,000 of foreign trade that everybody wants to fight for, that constitute our sacred "rights"—and I should like to have "rights" quoted—every nickel of that trade is being paid for every day by Americans, and not later than the 15th of March every Member of the Senate will write a little check and send it up to the Treasury of the United States to contribute his part of the $12,000,000,000 of "profits" from war. Every time I hear a word on the Senate floor about our "rights" I know that is the most monstrous bit of buffoonery, so far as logic is concerned, ever suggested to the American people. How can one talk about rights when he pays through the nose for them? In order to get this down to a more simple basis for the average citizen, who is not a legal expert, let me suggest a practical application in our everyday lives.

My neighbor, Bill Smith, wants to borrow some money from me, and I say, "If I lend you the money, you would never pay it back." "Well, I am going to use this money and buy something from you, Mr. BONE." My ears fairly wiggle and wave; the impulse of a trader is in me; I am a businessman; and I am so eager to make something and sell it that, even though I lose money by the transaction, I cannot resist the desire to "trade." I have a right to make something and to sell it, and therefore I have a right to assert that right. So I say to Bill Smith, "Sir, will you pay this back?" "Oh, perish the thought! Why should I pay back anything I borrow from you," says Smith. "Not only do I want to borrow this money but I will buy things of you; and just recall, Mr. BONE, that will keep your factory open; also, Mr. BONE, you have a beautiful, big, new automobile, a $5,000 Packard, and I want you to deliver this stuff in your Packard." I say, "You live in a tough neighborhood; you are engaged in a fight with a lot of thugs and bad people in your community, and they are liable to smash up my automobile." "O, Mr. BONE, in exercising your sacred rights you have a constitutional right to the use of the streets, and you have the police department to protect you." I am a little bit squeamish about this business; maybe I had better not do it; but still the impulse urges me; I think of my sacred rights; I am a trader, a business "big shot", an American businessman.

Perhaps my own son will have to go along in the automobile and get his head beaten off, but that is perfectly all right; and so I send my automobile down with a cargo in it which I know, in the very course of things, will never be paid for. My automobile is smashed up; my boy is badly injured. That is the picture presented by sacred world trade. Is the picture overdrawn? Ask yourselves when you look at the pension payments to take care of the boys who went across the seas, pensions which will be paid for, perhaps, the next two generations, and the debt which crushed us when the depression came on. That was the price of the exercise of our noble rights; and, impossible as it may seem, this Government in 1914 did an astounding thing that I have never been able to understand, though I have asked many people about it. Along in September 1914, when shippers could no longer get war-risk insurance on cargoes, the Congress of the United States passed the War Risk Insurance Act, thereby putting our Government not only in the insurance business to insure these desperate war risks, but it virtually invited Americans to get into that traffic, and in they went. Such legislation was a patent bid to war.

Mr. President, I think I would be recreant in my duty to the people of my State and to Americans generally if by any suggestion on this floor I decried peace.

I think when we set up against the passionate desire for peace residing in the hearts of the American people, the trade argument based on so-called American rights, especially when we know these rights will be translated into a terrible financial loss, into an army of insane, into an army of death, we present a picture to Americans in these tragic times that is not a healthy one. It is a picture too gloomy to contemplate.

The American people want action. They are fed up on theory. They are tired of experts who love dollars more than humanity. We had a Government of business experts over the years. Presidents Hoover, Coolidge, and President Harding had a lot of these experts guiding us through and along various paths of glory, and what a job they made of it. We confront the fact that while the joint resolution is not what all of us would like, and certainly I would like to see it go much further, yet it is in my judgment a further step toward peace. We will never, in my judgment—and I have all the respect in the world for those who differ with me—absolve ourselves from moral responsibility in this situation by talking about our rights when those rights are nothing but despair, disillusionment, and death.

Terrible as it may be, those of us in this Chamber may live long enough to see our civilization liquidated by forces of disorder and destruction if another great war comes and we are part of it. In such a horrible time we would not argue theories from this floor. We would hear a different kind of argument. It would be the argument that men employ when all the processes of civilization break down, and if anybody in this body thinks that cannot happen, let him look realistically at Europe. In such a crash we would not hear Senators argue any longer. We would face something so weird and bizarre that I hesitate even to think of it.

In such a crash we of America would be legitimate prey for all the forces of disorder and destruction. When there is an economical collapse we all know what happens to a civilization. All in the world we have to do to invite that collapse and make it inevitable is to spend billions of dollars more in another war to assert our right to trade. In the wake of that trade will come a new army of dead, a new army of insane, a new army of sick and crippled, a new debt that will crush us so we can never rise again. Enthrone this crazy doctrine and the four horsemen of the Apocalypse will ride through America and leave behind nothing but a train of destruction and utter desolation.

That is why I want to write into the pending measure this provision which I hope my brethren of the Senate, including the members of the Foreign Relations Committee, are willing to accept. I think this is a sound proposal. I feel that my fellow Senators can hardly walk away from the implications of this thing. I believe no man can very well vote to take the protection from a cargo worth half a million dollars and provide protection on a $10,000,000 vessel carrying it. That means the use of force to protect the boat.

I sincerely hope the joint resolution will be passed with my amendment included.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BONE. Certainly.

Mr. HATCH. I did not hear the Senator's amendment stated because I was not in the Chamber when he began his remarks. Would he mind restating it?

Mr. BONE. If the Senator will look at page 10 of the joint resolution he will find the place where the amendment is to be inserted. In line 13, after the word "thereunder", I propose to insert the words "or by the owner of the vessel carrying the same."

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Senator.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Megill, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the following bills of the Senate:

S. 84. An act to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Ralph Charles Stuart; and

S. 989. An act to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Clarence Quinton Pair.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

AMERICAN NEUTRALITY

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 51) to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war", approved August 31, 1935, being Public Resolution No. 67, Seventy-fourth Congress (S. J. Res. 173), as amended by joint resolution approved February 29, 1936, entitled "Joint resolution extending and amending the joint resolution (Public Res. 67, 74th Cong.), approved August 31, 1935."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not a member of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, and therefore I have been denied the privilege of hearing witnesses and considering data brought to the attention of the committee before the measure before us was reported. I have examined the resolution before us and have attempted to understand its purpose and to weigh its implications. After giving it such consideration as opportunity afforded, I have reached the conclusion, though reluctantly, that I cannot give it my support.

I do not believe that it possesses the virtues ascribed to it, or that it will secure the benefits which the supporters of the resolution, with more or less confidence, believe will be realized. If I thought that the adoption of the resolution would tend to promote peace, or that it would be efficacious in the field of genuine neutrality, I would gladly support it. It is unnecessary for me to state that since I have been in the Senate I have supported all measures which I believed were calculated to prevent international discords or controversies and would advance the cause of world peace.

Soon after the World War efforts were made to secure legislation that would provide more than a billion dollars to be expended in the construction of battleships and battle cruisers and subsidiary naval craft. This measure I opposed and offered a resolution in the Senate calling for an international conference for the purpose of bringing about, if not disarmament, at least a reduction in military preparations. In 1922 the President of the United States called a conference on the limitation of armaments, at which various powers were represented. Belgium, the British Empire, China, France, Japan, the Netherlands, and Portugal sent distinguished representatives who actively participated in the conference.

While the conference did not accomplish all that was desired, I think it can truthfully be stated that the results were of importance not only to the United States and participating nations, but to all other countries. It resulted in the saving of billions of dollars which otherwise would have been expended in the construction of war vessels.

Many believed that the conference should have been broadened in its scope and should have dealt with measures directly falling within the field or category of neutrality. However, it was an achievement to secure the consideration of matters which were brought before the conference. It was hoped by many persons in this and other lands that further conferences would follow the Washington Conference, at which the questions of international law and neutrality and other subjects of international importance might be considered and definite plans and policies agreed upon. Unfortunately the pressure of local and national problems which demanded consideration interfered with the consideration of international questions and problems, to the solution of which the combined wisdom of the leading nations of the world should have been directed. The spirit of nationalism was too strong in many countries, and efforts to bring nations into more harmonious relations were regarded either with suspicion or with violent disfavor. It was thought by many that the tragic lessons of the World War would compel a reexamination of all questions embraced within the field of international law.

It was believed by many that the time was propitious for strengthening the foundations of international law, including the promulgation of a rational and just system of neutrality. As I have indicated, there was lacking that broad and catholic spirit essential to a realization of the objectives referred to.

The world is still wandering in confusion and is surrounded by an atmosphere of suspicion and resentment and, unfortunately, fear and hatred. Military weapons are being forged and plans for military operations are being devised. The world resounds with the cries and threats of peoples who look with fear and dread upon the future and yet who are unwilling to sheath the sword and put on the habiliments of peace and good will.

I repeat it is a tragedy that selfishness and extreme nationalism should have been so pervasive and controlling, thus preventing a triumphant movement which would have been promotive of world peace. Unfortunately the golden opportunity to advance the reign of peace was not seized and the result has been a more aggressive spirit of nationalism, followed by open or hidden assaults upon weaker peoples' attacks upon democratic institutions, and the rise of totalitarian states, which seek increased power.

Mr. President, I have upon a number of occasions referred to the important position which this Republic occupies among the nations of the world; to its material and moral strength, and have expressed the hope that it would, by reason of the advantageous position which it occupies, take the lead in bringing the world out of its strife and confusion. The great majority of the people of the world do not desire dictators or military or imperialistic governments. They desire peace and opportunities for material, cultural, and spiritual advancement. They are animated by high ideals and look forward to a time when war will cease and the efforts of the people devoted to the promotion of the happiness and peace of all men.

I am not convinced that the resolution before us is timely or that it will accomplish the purpose for which it is designed. In my opinion our Nation should take the lead in formulating a code of international law which would be so broad and comprehensive as to not only promote neutrality but international cooperation. The measure before us, I fear, does neither.

There has been some progress since the days of Grotius, but not as much progress as should have been made by this and other democratic nations if they had exhibited a more earnest, and I might add, dynamic, spirit of leadership.

In my opinion there has been too much talk concerning the rights of belligerents and not enough of the rights of neutrals. There has been too much talk of war and not enough sincere effort to promote peace. While the claim has been made that regulations and rules sought to protect neutral rights and neutral trade and commerce, the fact remains that in the frequent conflicts between nations too much consideration has been given to the rights of belligerents.

I might add by way of parentheses that Grotius, as well as other great writers upon international law, believed that there could be imported into our international relations the benign spirit of municipal law, which, wherever it has prevailed—and it has prevailed in civilized nations—has made for peace among the communities, states, peoples, and nations. I see no reason why there should not be imported into international law that same benign spirit by nations being drawn together spiritually, morally, and otherwise; and why we should not adopt measures that will make for international peace, that will recognize the rights of all nations in time of war as well as in time of peace.

The United States has not often been a belligerent and therefore has been primarily interested in determining the rights of neutrals, particularly with reference to matters affecting trade and commerce. This has resulted in announcing, as an international policy, the freedom of the seas. I believe that our Nation has been foremost in championing the freedom of the seas. I am not willing to pursue a course which has been referred to today as a "scuttling" course, and seek isolation by the abdication of our rights at sea as well as our rights upon land.

We are, however, departing from the attitude formerly assumed and are proceeding upon the theory that the primary object of all regulations and laws as to neutrality is—regardless of consequences to our economic and industrial life—to avoid controversies with other nations or becoming involved in an international conflict.

Parallel with this view, our efforts seem to be to narrow the zone in which belligerent activities have been or will be begun. The aim of recent legislation by the Congress has not been the definition of what the United States as a neutral may still do. Rather has it aimed to prohibit the doing of so many things recognized as proper under international law.

As I understand the resolution before us, it seems to proceed upon the theory that we can be insulated against all possible dangers from international conflict. The proposed measure, as I have indicated, is not designed to specify what rights neutrals might have which are internationally recognized, but rather to emphasize belligerent rights. At any rate, the effort seems to have been to narrow neutral rights in reference to what would be conceded as belligerent rights. The rights of neutrals and belligerents should rest upon recognized principles of international law; every effort should be made to bring within the spirit and the letter of international law the rights of neutrals and belligerents; and the effort should be to magnify and protect, by proper rules and regulations based upon international law, neutral rights, even though there might be a modification and limitation upon heretofore recognized belligerent rights.

It seems to me efforts should be made to treat the question involved in the joint resolution under consideration as an international question, rather than as a matter concerning our Nation alone. A unitary approach to this question will involve implications perhaps not now appreciated, and consequences which might be avoided by the inauguration of a plan to have all nonbelligerent states join to protect neutral rights. An approach to this question by the important nations of the world would bring more satisfactory results than to attempt to deal with it as an isolated matter in which the United States alone is concerned.

I digress at this point to remark that while many persons today condemn as unworkable and as too idealistic the policies of Woodrow Wilson, he envisioned a day when the nations of the world would be brought together for the purpose of working out, under international law, policies which would make for the security and happiness of individuals as well as nations; and it is not too much to say that the same view, in part at least, was expressed by Theodore Roosevelt in his Nobel Prize speech. As I recall he advocated a league or concord of nations for the purpose of eliminating war and establishing world peace. He suggested an international police that would take cognizance of breaches of international law, and restrain any recalcitrant nation "that ran amuck" and disturbed the peace of the world.

I believe, Mr. President, that the future of the world is peace and not war; is a higher degree of civilization than that which has been attained; and any nation that neglects its duty—and it is a duty—to seek international harmony, and to strive to bring the nations together for their mutual advantage, fails in the discharge of the obligations resting upon it.

I believe, as I have stated, that an approach to this question by the important nations of the world will bring satisfactory results. It seems to me we may not deal with it by adopting a policy that may be regarded as an attempt to "scuttle" out of sight and to take refuge in isolation when there are clouds of war in the sky.

It is difficult to determine in advance what course should be or will be followed in the case of a world conflict, as we are attempting to do under this joint resolution, as I interpret its provisions. We may discuss the matter academically, and perhaps lay down some general rules of conduct; but, after all, when the flames of war envelop nations and approach our land or sweep over it, these isolation policies framed by a nation for the purpose of determining national conduct with respect to international questions will be forgotten or ignored.

It cannot be determined what course will be pursued by billigerents in future conflicts. When the World War broke upon the world, neutral nations did not know, and neither did the belligerents, what the lines of battle would be, or what instrumentalities of death and destruction ultimately would be employed. The announcement by a nation of the course it will pursue in the event of an international conflict probably would prove impotent in averting conflict or preventing the nation in question from being drawn within the field of international conflict. Indeed, our announcing to the world in advance what our policy shall be, and what inhibitions are imposed upon our Nation and upon our nationals, may and probably will prove advantageous to nations entering into the field of war. If the leading nations should agree upon fundamental questions and the rules and regulations to be adhered to in the event of war, then no advantage would be obtained by one nation over another.

A unitary declaration of policy may give belligerents opportunity to formulate their plans with reference to the announced policy of the nation making such a declaration. Moreover, the unilateral announcement of a policy imposes some restrictions when the conflagration comes that would prohibit adopting different plans and different regulations when the exigencies of the situation demanded them. I think that view was very clearly expressed by the able Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] in the illuminating address he delivered a day or two ago. To change the announced plan might prove advantageous to one or more of the belligerents to the disadvantage of other belligerents, and thus subject the United States to the charge of favoring one belligerent over another. It would seem obvious that the rules of neutrality have no international validity when enunciated by a single nation, whether those rules be announced by an executive or by a legislative body.

While it is true that the rules of international law are vague and insufficient, nevertheless they are based upon the consensus of agreements among nations; and while it is true, as was stated by the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] a moment ago, that in war laws are silent, and there are violations of agreements which have been entered into, nevertheless I think it may be said that, taking it by and large, there has been and there will be a growing disposition to adhere to international agreements, to respect their prohibitions, and to carry out in good faith their terms. If not, why do we have conferences with other nations? Why did the distinguished President of the United States and the Secretary of State recently visit South America? They sought to bring into more harmonious relations this Republic and Latin America.

To say that the world will pay no regard to international agreements is an indictment that I think is not warranted any more than to say that because there are many who violate our domestic laws, and because our prisons unfortunately are filled with many who have been law violators, the American people have no respect for the laws of their States and the laws of the United States. There will be law violators among people living in the United States, and there will be nations that will violate covenants they have made, but little by little, in my opinion, the world will rise to a higher standard of honor and integrity, and there will be attached to international agreements a sanctity which in the past has not been attained, but which ultimately I believe will guide and direct them largely, if not absolutely, in their international relations.

As I have indicated, in the event of an international conflict, regulations which one nation may promulgate, hoping to prevent its being drawn into the conflict, would not be accepted by belligerents if advantages might be derived by ignoring them. If we surrender a large part of our neutral rights, we need not expect that belligerents will be more constrained to regard conceded neutral rights or national territory. When we attempt to enumerate rights to be surrendered, we shall find that we must enumerate rights which we still hold fast. Belligerents are not concerned in the details of local legislation. They are at war, and admit no restraints except grudgingly—restraints imposed by international agreement—and even then, as I have indicated, infringements are made upon such international agreements.

It is doubtful whether by yielding rights we could secure isolation, or, if we did, whether the situation would be satisfactory. It has been said that no ostrich escaped danger by burying its head in the sand.

As I have indicated, neutrality is not the business of one nation—it is the concern of all nations; and the United States, with its prestige and power, should take the lead in urging other nations to agree upon certain general principles of international law, and they should be positive rather than negative. They should be concerned in the protection of neutral rights and less concerned in supporting belligerent rights or in giving tacit recognition to policies and practices claimed by belligerents. This course would assign to belligerents a more limited sphere of activity and undoubtedly have a wholesome effect in restraining illegal conduct upon their part. There are various subjects which could be, with practical unanimity, agreed upon among the nations. It is not necessary for me to enumerate them.

Undoubtedly, as indicated, many acts might be interdicted and many barbarous and ruthless practices which in the past have been evident, outlawed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado in the chair). The Senator's time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. KING. I will take some time on the bill.

Undoubtedly definitions could be agreed upon with respect to munitions to be used in actual war operations. And it is quite likely that any plan agreed upon would not include food and cotton because the moral sense of the world revolts against the idea of starving the civilian population, and I think it may be said that no regulation contrary to moral sense can be enforced. A list that attempted to include everything which might conceivably be turned into war uses would be futile, because it would mean stoppage of world trade, or a recrudescence of the old fight as to eventual belligerent destination.

We may in our wild dreams think that the seas are to be closed, that we are not to build ships for trade and commerce, and that the lanes of trade and commerce are to be closed. But the world will not come to that condition. We are an expanding world. We are growing closer together, and trade and commerce are as vital to civilization as books and preachers and the moral precepts which we hear from day to day reiterated by men of standing in their respective communities. We know that the attempted definition of "contraband" during the last war led to utter confusion, suspicion, and misunderstanding. One of the reasons for this confusion grew out of the fact that the belligerent governments themselves announced from time to time their own lists of contraband. These lists have never been agreed upon by a congress of nations, as they should be, and, of course, such action by a congress of nations would provide that the list could not be changed during the course of the war.

The view has prevailed that there ought to be prohibitions against Americans traveling through war zones, and, indeed, prohibiting all trade with belligerents. The reason for this view, doubtless, is that ships of belligerents may not be trusted to respect neutral rights or international agreements, and that American goods on the high seas and American travelers may be destroyed by belligerent ships, which would cause resentments in the United States which might eventuate in demands for American interference.

Of course, neither the Executive nor the Congress can prevent emotions or resentments. And this comes back to the suggestion which has been made that restraints imposed by one nation upon its nationals may be ineffective when an international conflict arises. The renunciation by a neutral nation, such as the United States, of rights acquired under international law can be almost certain to have an unfortunate effect and might extend the theater of conflict, because the belligerents would be sure to demand concessions from all nations equal to those given by one; and many nations would rather fight for their rights than surrender them without a struggle. They would realize that those who are trying to keep our country out of war by the surrender of these rights do not comprehend that by an admission of neutral impotence we might be surrendering the world to the mercies of war-loving and war-seeking nations.

Our country has stood for neutral rights, freedom of the seas, and the right to carry on trade in wartimes as well as in peacetimes. Some of these rights were surrendered or acquiesced in their loss during the World War. That was in part due to the sympathies of the American people for the allied cause; and, but with the sympathy for the Allies, we should not have been willing to surrender our right to trade and travel at the behest of anyone whether friendly or otherwise. Perhaps no hard and fast rule can be laid down to govern national action when the circumstances within which that action was taken are predictable. If the United States announces in advance that it will claim no neutral rights, will bar its citizens from travel, its ships from sailing the seas, its merchants from trading abroad, there would still be danger of involvement both through the probable action of the contestants and by reason of probable serious disorders at home which would force a change of American neutrality rules during the conflict.

It is not necessary for me to allude to the fact, with which we are all familiar, that when Germany invaded Belgium, and later when by her course she attacked our ships and the ships of other nations upon the high seas and interfered materially with our trade, demands were made by the American people that the United States should intervene. A distinguished American, whose name is known and revered by the people today, Theodore Roosevelt, criticized the conduct of the administration then in power, and indicated that failure to intervene was not consistent with the duty of our Nation.

Be that as it may, there was a strong sentiment upon the part of the American people against the policy that was being pursued, which threatened our trade and commerce and our relations with other nations, and, indeed, threatened to produce irreparable injury to our industry and agriculture.

Senators will remember the fall in the prices of cotton and other commodities and the almost universal demand that some action should be taken by the Government for the protection of our trade and commerce.

It is well known that under the present rules governing trade, war stimulates production to a point where there appears to be prosperity. Other nations would be taking advantage of a war stimulus while we would be curtailing production and thus causing severe industrial depression, and perhaps an industrial paralysis. If farmers and manufacturers see world prices advancing and world markets expanding and to have their own factories idle and the farms unproductive, there would be insistent demands for a modification of the policy being pursued by the Government, which gave to them no protection for their surplus products and for their share of the trade of the world.

Laws governing neutrality, as they are declared by a single nation, are almost certain to be dangerous, especially if they are the result of superficial thinking against a background of sentimentality. They are almost certain to be war breeders, not war preventives. All regulations of the kind have as one of their purposes to make war itself more difficult, and should have that as their principal purpose, rather than the narrow one of keeping the United States or some other single nation from becoming involved.

That is why I am trying to emphasize the importance of a multilateral agreement rather than a unilateral proclamation. We must bring together the nations of the world and strengthen international law rather than try to evolve an isolated policy dealing exclusively with our own rights, our own duties, or our own responsibilities in a warring world.

Laws governing neutrality to serve any broader purpose really effectively, however, should be international and as nearly as possible universal. Only in comparatively small matters would it be safe for the United States to issue its own regulations dealing with the question of neutrality and the rights or the wrongs and limitations upon belligerents.

If this country should, by legislation, surrender its neutral rights, as some persons assert it ought to do, America would deal a severe blow to international law. It would mean the surrender of the immemorial right reserved to every nation to extend protection to its citizens at all times, a right and duty which is the very cornerstone of international law. A tame acquiescence in measures that belligerents might take against American trade would lead to similar acquiescences in other aggressions. For example, if only belligerent rights are to be considered, how long would it be before bases were established in neutral territory? If a belligerent decided to use one of the islands contiguous to our territory or one of the capes of the continent, how long would it be before bases were established in neutral territory? If a belligerent decided to use Long Island as a base, would the United States acquiesce? One surrender leads inevitably to another.

It has always been the American aim to contribute to the growth of international law, not to whittle away that law. We must, of course, recognize that many of the laws of neutrality, as formally recorded in international law, have been rendered obsolete by mechanical and scientific developments. They are, in consequence, little observed; and yet they are based on both moral and material realities. For the United States to scrap them, alone among the nations, would be dangerous and arrogant. For the United States, on the other hand, in conjunction with other nations, to rewrite and modernize these regulations, with rights of neutrals rather than of belligerents in mind, might result in localizing a future war so completely that it would be almost innocuous to the world at large. It is impossible to state what rules might be arrived at or devised, because in every conference new theories are advanced and developed and adopted or discussed and discarded.

Such a revision might obligate all neutrals to withhold all supplies from belligerents. It might strengthen instead of scrap the doctrine of the freedom of the seas. It might devise some method whereby all neutrals would act together temporarily completely to boycott belligerents. Such a coalition, except in the case of a really great war, would be more effective than anything imaginable in bringing strife to an end.

This whole matter ought to be studied intensively in the Department of State and by those upon whom authority rests to deal with these matters—studied historically and in the light of present scientific and mechanical developments, even in the light of what we want to believe is a keener moral sense. The Department of State should be alert, and I know that it is, to find an opportunity to bring the nations of the world together in a high endeavor to devise rules of neutrality which would both protect the neutrals and hinder the possibility of war. When this time comes, as come it must, the United States should have a plan as sensible and clear-cut, as far reaching and as humanitarian as was the plan for naval limitations which Mr. Hughes so dramatically presented at the Washington Conference.

Mr. President, my time has nearly expired, and I am compelled, therefore, to pretermit a discussion of a number of matters that I would urge in support of my position in opposition to the resolution. Obviously the resolution has but little to do with neutrality, nor, in my opinion, will it make for peace. It will also injuriously affect trade agreements which the administration has negotiated and others which it is hoped will be negotiated with other nations. And, in my opinion, it will also run counter to the Kellogg-Briand Pact and be prejudicial to efforts which may be made to secure a reduction in armaments. The cash-and-carry provision of the measure, in my opinion, militates against the weaker powers, and certainly will be advantageous to those nations whose ships command the seas. Some of the Latin-American nations will discover, in the event of serious international conflicts, the disadvantage to which they will be subjected.

Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks an editorial from the Washington Post under date of February 23, 1937, and also an article by Dorothy Thompson entitled "The Unneutrality Bill."

There being no objection, the articles referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of Feb. 23, 1937]

"PEACE ACT", 1937 MODEL

Senator PITTMAN is eminently correct in pointing out that the so-called neutrality bill, favorably reported out on Saturday by the Foreign Relations Committee, has nothing to do with neutrality. Whether he will prove equally accurate in calling the measure the "Peace Act of 1937" is much more doubtful.

The bill has nothing to do with neutrality because on the one hand it seeks to deprive Americans of freedom of action, in the event of foreign war, which by no accepted definition could be called unneutral. And on the other hand it serves notice in advance that the United States will draw no distinctions between a violator of international law and the victim of that violation. This is not neutrality. It is a compound of ignorance, timidity, and ineffective isolationism.

The measure not merely effectively undermines the Kellogg Pact but also cuts squarely across the trade-agreements policy whereby Secretary Hull has sought to substitute economic internationalism for autarchy of the made-in-Germany model. This utter contradiction in our foreign policy, of course, explains why Secretary Hull weakly failed to testify before the Senate committee on the probable effects of the Pittman measure. He must know that it threatens to blow the bottom out of the trade policy for which he has worked so assiduously.

The Pittman bill, if enacted, will do wonders to stimulate the world race in armaments already under way. By partially withdrawing America from the international picture, in the event of war, it will force preparedness in advance among all countries which have a large normal trade with us. American agriculture will suffer by the forced development of alternative sources of supply elsewhere. We shall not have to wait for war abroad to see the consequences of this legislation.

Those who will be most surprised at the outcome will be those emotional pacifists who have lined up for what they call "mandatory neutrality." As this policy encourages feverish armament programs elsewhere we shall similarly fall in line. The first indications of this are already at hand; but only the first indications. The "Peace Act of 1937" is certain to be followed by even higher American naval, air, and military appropriations.

It can be said that the bill might be worse; that it might place a rigid mandatory embargo on the export of any supplies to belligerents in the event of war abroad. But to say this is merely to say that Congress has not the courage of its convictions. It is not willing to pay the price of that real isolation which might, at terrific cost, make this so-called neutrality policy effective in insulating the United States from world events.

The compromise "cash and carry" provision is a perfect illustration of this failure to look the issue in the face. It places a premium on command of the seas which makes further talk of naval disarmament absurd. It means that in a European war we side automatically with Great Britain and that in an Asiatic war we side automatically with Japan, provided only that their fleets rule respectively the Atlantic and the Pacific.

As Great Britain and Japan augment naval construction to accept this situation it may be hoped we shall at least have the grace not to criticize them for a direct result of our "Peace Act of 1937."

ON THE RECORD

(By Dorothy Thompson)

THE UNNEUTRALITY BILL

It is, of course, utterly impossible to lay down a hard and fast program for preventing world war, but it is the thesis of this column that should a war of world proportions occur, any neutrality legislation which we may pass today cannot be counted on to keep us out of it, and will tie our hands, limit our influence, and restrict our power which now, in time of peace, may be used to help prevent such a war from occurring. If war comes it will be statesmanship on the spot and not compulsion on the Government to act in any rigid way which will keep us out of it. We could, to be sure, frame an almost sure and foolproof neutrality policy. If we decided that we did not care what happened in the rest of the world, and were determined to restrict our political, military, and economic interests to this hemisphere, we could do so. But no one has even suggested that we prepare to pay the prodigious price involved.

The neutrality bill thinks of us wholly as sellers and not as buyers in world trade. But large sections of American industry depend upon imported materials. The President, under the neutrality bill, is compelled, under certain conditions, to keep our ships out of war zones. Suppose there is a war involving Japan and England, and Japan manages to blockade British and Dutch possessions in the Far East, which are the chief source of our rubber supply. Without rubber our automobile industry collapses. Will we stand by in such a case?

American naval policy is certainly not confined to the defense of the American coast. Mr. Cordell Hull's policy is certainly not predicated by our withdrawal from world trade, but by precisely the opposite. And Mr. Hull is consistent. To the members of the Council on Foreign Relations he said Thursday night that "it is not beyond the power of statesmen today to check and reverse the drift toward world anarchy", and he suggested the principles laid down at the Buenos Aires conference as a basis for ending this anarchy. That means "the loyal acceptance by nations of the rule of law guarantees for the integrity of each, and implementing renunciation of war by methods of instantaneous cooperative action." These are positive and not negative proposals.

As far as the Americas are concerned, this country has already entered upon a scheme for collective consultation and collective action in case a war threatens or breaks out on this hemisphere. But the proposed neutrality bills may possibly wreck even the results of the Buenos Aires conference and even any scheme for collaborative action between the Americas. For although both the House and Senate bills exempt the American Republics from the arms and other embargoes in case of war between them and a non-American power, they make an arms embargo mandatory in case of war between two American Republics. Should, for instance, war break out between Argentina and Brazil, we would be forced to stop war supplies immediately to either belligerent. England, Germany, France, or Italy, however, would be free to provision either or both of them, so that one or more European powers might determine the result of a war on this hemisphere. Conceivably, the result might be to turn an American Republic into a new Spain, and all that we could do would be to enforce a blockade. And that would almost certainly mean war, possibly of international proportions.

Also, under the terms of the Buenos Aires Treaty, we would immediately enter into conference with the belligerents and other American powers. But we would enter that conference with our hands tied. Before it started, we would remove from our representatives anything with which they could bargain. If all the South American Republics should agree with us upon one course of action, and one should refuse to arbitrate, we would be compelled to treat the recalcitrant exactly like the rest. An emasculated State Department could do little more to compel arbitration than to speak noble words.

This country is not prepared to offer collaboration in the enforcing of peace upon the whole world. But, then, let us at least keep our heads clear, our tongues uncommitted, and our hands free for whatever emergency may arise in this anarchic world. Legislation which compels the Government to act in any rigid way to meet circumstances as yet completely unpredictable will, I am convinced, one day rise up to plague us.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, it was 2 o'clock in the morning. The rain was running off my steel helmet in sheets. I was cold, lonesome, homesick, and hungry. The armistice had been signed about 2 weeks. I was on guard duty at a stockade surrounding German prisoners. We had 437 German prisoners. We were still required to keep guard over them. I saw a light burning over in the barracks, within the stockade, where I knew that Frank, the German cook, was preparing the meal for the next day. I threw a piece of gravel over against the barracks. A light flashed out and a German squarehead poked out, and I spoke to Frank in the best language I could. I said, "Frank, give me das brot und der kaffee." He said, "Ya." Pretty soon he brought a canteen cup of steaming hot coffee, and it had sugar and cream in it, two delicacies we did not often have. He also had a piece of German coffee cake with raisins in it, another delicacy he had taken from the allotment for cooking purposes. The lightning flashed as he poked the coffee and the coffee cake through the woven-wire fence, and I saw his face. There was no cynical grin of hatred there. There was a smile of friendliness; and if he saw my face, he saw friendliness upon it.

I did not hate Frank. I loved him. He did not hate me. He loved me. And yet if I had met Frank 2 weeks before that at that hour of the night on the battlefield, I would have killed him or he would have killed me. That is war—bringing men together to kill each other who otherwise would love each other.

The ex-service man hates war with every atom and fiber of his being, because he knows the futility of it. War never proved which side was wrong. It only proved which side was strong, and the ex-service man knows that.

I have listened to the debate on this neutrality measure. I had no intention of taking part in the debate until I heard arguments to the effect, or leaving the impression on me, at least, that property and property rights were to be considered in the same balance as blood and human rights. I cannot restrain myself from speaking on this subject.

This resolution has never been thought of by its advocates as a measure intended to take the profits out of war. A bill will soon be favorably reported I hope—at least there are several such bills before the Committees on Military Affairs and Finance—intended to take the profits out of war. The resolution now under consideration is intended to extend periods of peace and remove the possibilities of war as far as it is humanly possible to remove them by the process of legislation which is being considered now while we are cool and deliberate, rather than to rush through something under spur and whip, during the hysteria of a war period—or even in the period preceding a war.

Therefore to argue that one should vote against this resolution because it does not take the profits out of war is not, as I see it, in point. I am going to support this resolution because it places an embargo on munitions to belligerents.

I walk down the street and see two boys quarrelling. I give one a pair of knuckles and the other one a club, and then I stand back and watch them destroy each other. A crowd gathers and I say, "I am not taking any part in the struggle." I am obviously lying. The crowd knows I am a liar and a hypocrite.

America could furnish the munitions for a war and then we could shout from the housetops that we are a peace-loving Nation. Our words would whisper "peace", but our actions would thunder "war." Therefore I am going to support the resolution.

When war broke out in South America between two South American countries President Franklin D. Roosevelt announced by proclamation an embargo on munitions to those two warring nations, and that war did not last long. Led by that example, 18 other nations followed with embargoes.

Argument was made on the floor of the Senate this morning to the effect that if America passes this neutrality legislation it will be the first and only nation to do it. I should be proud of that place in the sun.

Shall we argue that because a thing has never been done before it should not be done now? That because someone else has not done it, therefore we should not do it? Is that argument? Precedent is all right, but when confronted with irresistible logic it should fall.

We heard the argument yesterday that this resolution might do thus-and-so. That the proposed legislation, by not allowing goods to be sold as they were before, might lead us into war. We are confronted with this dilemma. On one side we have a situation that is not certain. We know the other situation leads to war. Therefore, why not resolve the doubt in favor of a possibility that might prolong the period of peace?

Out West—that day is over now—in the early day when two gunmen came into town representing opposites in a feud, the streets were cleared. No man thought that in leaving the street he was scuttling and running. No man thought when he left the street clear to the two opponents in that fight that he was a coward.

He simply was getting out of the line of fire and that is all we are doing in this instance—getting America out of the line of fire. It is not running away. What is it to maintain a right? I can always remember that headstone upon which was inscribed the words:

> Here lies old man Jay,
> Who died maintaining his right of way.

[Laughter.]

It does not do much good to maintain a right such as that.

When nations are at war the situation is different than during peacetimes. International law has never been defined. A law is no stronger than the power to enforce it to make it mandatory. When nations are already using all the power they have in war, who is going to make the law mandatory? International law is a law of peacetime only. War knows no law. When you are killing men that is as far as you can go, anyway.

Argument has been made that the passage of the pending joint resolution will bring war to our shores. I fail to be impressed by that argument. In the first place, a belligerent will destroy any shipment that might aid his enemy at the most strategic place, so far as he is concerned, or wherever he meets it. When a blockage is laid down the smaller its scope the more effective it can be made; the larger it is, the less effective it becomes; so that trying to blockade the United States or North America would be a most difficult task; whereas a smaller blockade, laid down at some strategic place, would be much more effective and make it possible to destroy shipments. No nation is going to resist the irresistible logic of destroying goods at the most strategic place and the easiest place they could reach, which certainly would not be our shores if the war were between foreign countries.

Then, again, I am not impressed by the argument with reference to bringing war to our shores, because of the distance which separates us from other powers which distance would make it difficult for the belligerents to carry sufficient munitions to fight a war at our doors. Where would they get their cannon? Where would they get their ammunition, shells, and torpedoes? After a submarine has shot its quota of torpedoes it is done; it is like a wasp without a stinger until it gets back to its home base and obtains more torpedoes. That is true of all forms of ammunition. How, then, would the passage of the pending measure bring a war to our doors? There might be some shooting in one of our ports; but, pray tell me, what difference the passage of this measure would make in that regard. If two battleships of opposing fleets should meet in our ports or anywhere else they would either fight there or one of them would run. Therefore having a law, or not having a law, would not make any difference.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator there?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. Of course, there is a law of our country which prohibits the use of our territorial waters as a base of naval operations by one belligerent against another.

Mr. LEE. The limit is 3 miles, is it not?

Mr. PITTMAN. It is 3 miles. We also have a law which provides that a ship coming into our ports for the purpose of refueling can only come in once in 3 months; and, in addition to that, it is provided in the pending joint resolution that even armed merchantmen may only come into our waters under such regulations as the President may prescribe. These considerations simply add to what the Senator has said as to the practical absurdity of the suggestion that vessels of belligerents could fight on this side of the ocean.

Mr. LEE. That is quite true, and I thank the Senator for his contribution.

The next argument made was that we are by this proposed law placing ourselves in alliance with Great Britain on the Atlantic and Japan on the Pacific. Mr. President, what difference would the passage of this measure make in the size of the navies of those two countries? It would not make any difference. Then, wherein do we ally ourselves with either nation or with both by the passage of this proposed legislation? Do those who make the argument infer that we should not pass the joint resolution but should escort with our own Navy the merchant ships to their destination? That is the only other alternative. If we pass the joint resolution, the assertion is made that we thereby become allies of Japan and Great Britain; but if we do not pass it, then will not the larger navies protect their own shipping and their own goods, anyway? Or do the Senators mean that with each shipment of goods we shall send vessels of our Navy as an escort; and, if we should do that, then would it not extend the possibility of our being drawn into the next war?

The next thought is, where would our responsibility for the goods end under the policy of economic protection by military force for the purpose of private profit? May I say here, in answer to the argument that was made that it would only serve the big corporations to increase their profits, that I fail to appreciate the force of that suggestion. Everyone knows that a big corporation can sell more goods where it can extend credit, whereas, under the provisions of the pending measure, cash must be paid by the foreign buyer, and the little fellow in America can sell the same as the large corporations. So it works in the reverse, instead of favoring the great corporation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. LEE. I thank the Chair. I shall continue for a few moments on the bill.

There was once an unwritten economic policy according to which a nation—and some nations still follow the policy—would send a military force into foreign countries in order to protect private investments. Our nation followed that policy to some extent. Can anyone here tell me why the marines were ever sent to Nicaragua? We were given seven different reasons. We were told, in the first place, that they were sent there to protect American property. We found our Government had no property in Nicaragua except the Canal Zone rights, which never were jeopardized. We were then told they were sent there in order to protect American lives. We found no Americans who were in danger there except in line of duty. We were then told they were sent there to assure the holding of a just election, and some wag suggested, in a facetious manner, of course, sending them to certain places in our own country, and we laughed that off.

Finally the truth was discovered that there were investments of private capital in Nicaragua to the amount of eighteen and a half million dollars. That was legitimate; that was all right; it was commendable, and might even be encouraged; but when those capitalists invested that sum of money in a foreign country they did so with but one purpose in mind, and that was to make profit; they were motivated by but one purpose, and that was profit. It was a commercial venture, pure and simple. If they made a profit, they had a right to it; if they had a loss, so far as I am concerned, I should not care to be cut in on it. But it cost America the lives of 150 American boys and the lives of 450 Nicaraguans, and six and a half million dollars to protect private investments in Nicaragua to the amount of eighteen and a half million dollars. It also cost us the good will of the Latin American countries. While our President, Mr. Coolidge, was speaking, in all good faith, on the floor of the peace conference, I believe, at Habana, at that same hour newsboys on the streets were shouting, "Forty Nicaraguans killed in an American air raid in an undeclared war for the protection of a private investment in a foreign country." The coconut growers of South America would make more money if the monkeys did not carry off so many coconuts. [Laughter.] And if we should send our marines down there to save their coconuts the same proposition would be involved, but it would not lead us into war.

If our ships are to follow the goods in order to protect them, where will they stop; where will American responsibility end? How far are we going to pursue the policy of protecting private investments by military force? When Mr. Roosevelt was elected, for the first time after 12 years he got the last marine out of Nicaragua.

Not only that, but when war broke out in Cuba there was some agitation in favor of sending a battleship to Cuba to put down the revolution there. The Sugar Trust for years has taken millions of dollars of profit out of Cuba. That is legitimate; that is all right. I am willing for them to take the profit and also the loss, but I do not want either. Mr. Roosevelt and the Government of the United States said, "There will be no intervention in Cuba", and there was none. Cuba settled her own affairs without our staining our hands with the blood of our fellow men, and a long step was taken toward the policy of nonintervention for the protection of private investment in foreign countries.

If an American citizen is in a foreign country within his rights, and is discriminated against because he is an American citizen, then it becomes an affair for the Government of the United States, but if he knows when he enters the foreign country that he is subject to the laws of that country—and by virtue of the fact that he goes in he does know that he is subject to the laws of that country—then he is put on notice and, so far as I am concerned, if he receives the same treatment as is accorded all other foreigners, I cannot see that it is a governmental affair. That is simply the policy of nonintervention which, in my opinion, this proposed law will help to extend by saying we will not jeopardize world peace in a time of international war by protecting private investments with military force.

Mr. President, I cannot understand how anyone could weigh in the balance gold against blood. I hope, and I say this by way of parenthesis, that we can bring out and enact legislation which will take, as far as humanly possible, the profits out of war. I hope we can go further than that and enact a law which will in case of war conscript money and materials as well as men. We are met by the argument, "That is unconstitutional. You cannot do that. You can take a man's life, but you cannot take his money."

Abraham Lincoln came to New York to get more money to keep the stars in the flag. He saw the bankers holding out for better terms, and stood up, the fire flashing from his eyes, and said, "I can conscript the widow's only son. I can take him from between the plow handles, where he is earning a living for her and himself, and put him in the front of battle, where his life will not last 6 minutes, but I cannot get enough money to pay for the food he will eat before he is shot." That was true during the last war, and, unless we do something about it during peacetimes, it will be true in the next war.

We hear it said that it is unconstitutional. Why is it unconstitutional? It is said we cannot take property without due process of law. If that is unconstitutional, what about the involuntary servitude mentioned in the same Constitution? War knows no limit, because it is like the heathen—it is a law unto itself, like the war powers of any nation.

I hope we will have the opportunity to enact such a provision, but that is only by way of parenthesis, because I am not depending upon this measure on which we are about to vote. I am not depending upon it as the sole means of keeping us out of war. It is only a contributing means toward helping bring about that result.

The distinguished Senators who argued against the bill said they were going to vote against it. The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] were in this body when war was declared. Has either of those Senators brought forth a program which would tend to help to keep us out of the next war? Perhaps they have ideas, but they merely say, "No; we will not try something else."

Lest someone misunderstand, I did not see active service during 10 months in France, but I saw the results of it. I was at Camp Dix, N. J. I saw the boys dying with the flu in that camp like flies. Many of them were exposed because of the flimsy raincoats which had been issued to them. Should nothing be done to protect those boys in the next war against such conditions as that? My own buddy, a swarthy lad from Colorado, drilled me, and I was trained by him. We were on the firing squad which every morning marched down to the station and fired a salute over the flag-wrapped body of one of our buddies and laid it on a train to ship back home to some little station where a mother met it.

Then one day my own buddy came in from the drill field soaked through to the skin, although he was covered by that flimsy raincoat sold to the Government by the manufacturer who had chiseled the Government in its sale. Next day my buddy went to the hospital, and then to the morgue. As I stood there at the station and fired a salute over the flag-wrapped body of my own buddy, I took the vow in my own heart which I am keeping now. I said, "I will make my next war on war profits and do everything one man can do to bring about every condition that will remove, so far as it is humanly possible to do it, any possibility of war."

I am speaking today for those who cannot speak. I am talking for lips that have been sealed with the seal of death. I ask those men who weigh property rights in this debate, who are so interested and concerned about property rights, if they have ever gone into the hospitals and seen the living dead, the gassed lungs, the boys suffering with the white plague, merely waiting for the end? Could they weigh property against that? Have they ever been to one of our insane asylums and seen those shell-shocked boys? Their bodies came back, but their minds did not. Can they do that and then talk property as against human rights as they are doing in this debate?

Have they seen those dangling heads supported by iron frames? Have they seen those legless bodies in wheel chairs? This morning I read the paper, but who read it for those boys for whom the light of day has gone forever? Can they weigh property against blood? Has it come to pass that men are willing to say we must guard a questionable honor, so to speak, on the high seas and go into the line of fire and have our country drawn into war rather than to try something which might remove the possibility of war?

Our Government was charitable and gave our Gold Star Mothers a trip to Europe to see the last resting place of their sons. It was rather a poor consolation to a mother to stand by 6 feet of earth and a little white cross and be told, "Your son sleeps there." Does that repay her for those years of dreams and hopes and ambition? What for? To protect somebody's commerce on the high seas. I shall never vote for it. I wonder if that mother would be for it.

Out at the tenth kilometer post at Chateau-Thierry sleeps my buddy, a boy who hit the line on the football field. When Mrs. Anderson stands by George's grave there, what must she think?

I am speaking for that man who cannot speak. I am speaking for what is represented by the wooden crosses of the United States in our greatest war cemetery. Cannot Senators hear the mute eloquent appeal they made, "Don't put property in the scale with blood"?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I hesitate to take any of the time of the Senate at this stage of the debate. I wish we were about to vote on the joint resolution itself. If the joint resolution had reached that parliamentary stage, I certainly should not now interrupt, after the eloquent appeal to which the Senate has just listened from the lips of the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. LEE].

The fact is that there are amendments to be moved out of the way before we can get to the real issue; and I wish to address myself for not more than 2 or 3 minutes to the amendment pending before the Senate at the present time simply to state why I shall support the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], which proposes to strike from the joint resolution section 2 (a).

Section 2 (a) of the pending measure is a proposal to give to the President power to place restrictions on the shipment of certain articles or materials in addition to arms, ammunition, and implements of war, the power to be with the President to select the articles and commodities in question.

Mr. President, to me it seems that such power in any President is a power to join at once, if he chooses, with other nations in a program of sanctions against another nation at war—a move which, to my way of thinking, would be so wholly contrary to the true spirit of neutrality that it ought not to be countenanced. Such power as is proposed to be given to the President in this particular subsection is a power to destroy our neutrality, and a power, too, actually to make for war, or to build, consciously or unconsciously, a condition which might have a tendency to draw our country into a war.

No policy whatever dealing with our trade with nations at war is better than a policy giving discretion to a President to select articles for embargo after a war has come—that is, if we really desire to strive for a neutral position and positively desire to maintain it.

It seems to me that experience definitely dictates that whenever we leave a discretion in providing a neutrality policy, we at once issue an invitation to selfish corporations and selfish individuals to hammer away and to exert pressure on the one holding such discretionary power. Experience has revealed how terrific that pressure may be; and it seems to me, in the light of experience, that if it lies within our power we ought to wish to prevent ever placing a President "on the spot", as it were—such a spot as would be entailed if section 2 (a) of the pending joint resolution were to be enacted.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, subdivision (a) of section 2 seems to me to be a part of the program outlined in subdivisions (a) and (b) of section 2; and if (b) is to remain in the law—the pending amendment does not propose to strike out (b)—then, as I understand, American ships could carry all the material covered by subdivision (b).

Mr. PITTMAN. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, our ships would go upon the ocean carrying American goods, although the title would be supposed to have passed before they left our shores; but American ships, under the American flag, would be carrying American goods, and the only question in controversy would be whether the title had actually passed. It seems to me that would complicate the situation in such a way that we could hardly protect our interests against a mere transfer of title which might be actual or might not be actual, but which never would be regarded or respected by those who were being adversely affected.

It seems to me that if subdivision (a) should go out, there would have to be some modification as to subdivision (b). Therefore I am not clear as to just what it is proposed to accomplish by striking out subdivision (a), because the ships would go to the next port and load with the goods which they are permitted to carry, and the ships would be upon the ocean. In a war condition, in a great controversy, they would be upon the ocean, carrying American goods under the American flag, and they would have nothing to protect them against those who were dissatisfied with the situation except a paper title.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. From my point of view, the chief advantage gained by eliminating section (a) is to eliminate an Executive discretion which permits a choice of commodities to be embargoed, because it seems to me the existence of that option is both an external and an internal menace.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I appreciate the Senator's view with reference to the discretionary power; but undoubtedly, under the decision of the Supreme Court in the embargo case, we have the power to vest this discretionary power in the President.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Beyond doubt, we have the right, but I question the wisdom of it.

Mr. BORAH. We have the authority to do it. If the President is dealing with a war situation, and a crisis is at hand, I think the Commander in Chief, the man who has the direction of affairs, must have a vast amount of discretion under a measure of this kind. If I should vote in favor of striking out this subdivision, it would not be because of the discretionary power; it would be because I am not in favor of taking our ships off the sea under those circumstances. Indeed, I am not in favor of taking them off the sea at all, so long as they carry goods and commodities other than arms, munitions, and implements of war.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, subsection (b), in the same section with subsection (a), does two things. In the first place, it prevents any property of a citizen of the United States being destroyed or confiscated in transportation during war to a belligerent country. In the second place, by that very act it eliminates controversy on behalf of a citizen of the United States through our Government as to whether the goods were legally or illegally destroyed or confiscated. The question involved as to whether they were legally or illegally confiscated depends upon the definition of contraband of war. If the goods on board are contraband of war, then, under all the existing customs of nations, they are subject to confiscation. If they are not contraband of war they are not subject to confiscation.

We have not, however, any satisfactory definition of contraband of war. Grotius, in his definition, admits that conditional contraband of war may be contraband of war if it is essential for a belligerent to take it for his safety. When it is necessary for a belligerent to take property for his safety, what property he may thus take depends very greatly on the conditions of the particular war, on a varying state of facts that cannot be determined in advance. The belligerent contends one thing; the neutral contends another thing; and there is not any court or any supreme power to decide the controversy except war.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Am I correct in assuming that in case subsection (a) should be stricken out, American ships could be used for the purpose of carrying whatever goods might be carried under subdivision (b)?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is true; and so far as the property is concerned which might be carried by American ships under subsection (b), the property would be protected so far as the citizen was concerned, because the title would be transferred, even though it were an American ship. The property would be safe under subsection (b), but the lives of the seamen on the ship would not be safe.

Mr. BORAH. Then the reverse of that would be true—that anything which might be carried under subdivision (a) of section 2 would naturally be prohibited under subdivision (b) of section 2.

Mr. PITTMAN. No; that is not true at all.

Mr. BORAH. Why not?

Mr. PITTMAN. Because under subsection (b), which is an entirely separate provision of law, anything except arms, ammunition, and implements of war may be transferred, and there is only one restriction on its transportation or exportation, namely, that the title must have passed.

Mr. BORAH. Subdivision (a) says:

> Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations as provided in section 1 of this act and he shall thereafter find that the placing of restrictions on the shipment of certain articles or materials in addition to arms, ammunition, and implements of war from the United States to said belligerents named in the proclamation issued under section 1 * * * is deemed necessary to promote the security or preserve the peace or neutrality of the United States or to protect the lives and commerce of nationals of the United States, he shall so proclaim—

And so forth.

He could put an inhibition on any articles he desired.

Mr. PITTMAN. Only as to American ships.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; but so far as the goods were concerned, they might be the same class of goods that are covered by subdivision (b).

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; and any ship except an American ship may carry any goods except arms, ammunition, and implements of war.

Mr. BORAH. And if this subdivision is stricken out, American ships may carry them.

Mr. PITTMAN. If this subdivision is stricken out, American ships may carry them; and American ships may carry them if the President does not designate any article under that authority.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. I find it impossible to reconcile the provisions of section 1 (a) and the provisions of section 2 (b).

Section 1 (a), as I understand, provides an absolute prohibition against the exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war; and it makes no difference whether such arms, ammunition, and implements of war are to be carried in an American ship or in a foreign ship. The prohibition is all inclusive, reaching all classes of ships.

If we turn to section 2 (b), we find it provides that—

> It shall be unlawful to export or transport to any belligerent country, or to any country wherein civil strife exists, named in said proclamation or proclamations issued under section 1 of this act, or to any other country for transshipment to, or for the use of, such belligerent country or such country wherein civil strife exists, any article or materials whatever—

And so forth. That expression "any articles or materials" must include the articles and materials—namely, the arms, ammunition, and implements of war—prohibited by section 1.

Mr. PITTMAN. No; it does not. The Senator is wrong.

Mr. WHITE. But subsection 2 (b) then goes on and says:

> Until all right, title, and interest therein shall have been transferred to some foreign government, agency, institution, association, partnership, corporation, or national.

I cannot reconcile those two things. Section 1 is an absolute prohibition. Section 2 (b), as I read it, is a prohibition until title shall have passed; and those two things just do not square in my mind. I should like to have the confusion cleared up.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will give the Senator my construction of it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Section 1, subsection (a), is an embargo.

Mr. PITTMAN. Here is the language to which I wish to call attention, found on page 6, line 18:

> That (a) whenever the President shall find that there exists a state of war between, or among, two or more foreign states, the President shall proclaim such fact, and it shall thereafter be unlawful to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war—

There is something that is absolutely unlawful. The restriction is not placed upon a citizen or upon a foreigner. It is placed upon the goods.

When we turn to subsection (b), to which the Senator has referred, we find that it applies to the transportation of goods which it is lawful to transport.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, it provides that it is unlawful to export or to transport to any belligerent country or to any country named in said proclamations under section 1. In section 1 are named the countries and the articles which it is unlawful under any circumstances or by any ship to transport. Here it is stated that it is unlawful to export or to transport these articles until right, title, or interest has passed.

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly subsection (b) refers to articles which it is lawful to transport, but other articles and materials cannot be transported unless the title is first transferred.

Let me read a little further in that section to show how the idea is carried out. In subsection (b) it is stated:

> Insurance written by American underwriters on any articles and materials, the export of which is prohibited by this act, or on articles carried by an American vessel or aircraft contrary to subsection (a)—

And so forth.

In other words, there are two conditions. First, if they are attempting to carry articles upon which there is an embargo, arms, ammunition, and implements of war, or if they are attempting to carry other materials the transportation of which on American vessels has been prohibited, then the insurance company cannot claim that the Government should present a demand on a foreign government on account of the loss of the goods. So it is perfectly clear that two items are covered there.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. President, while the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations has the floor, I should like to ask him a few questions about the relationship between the pending measure and trade on the Great Lakes. If I understand correctly section 1, the first section of the joint resolution, found on page 6, in the event England and Japan were at war it would probably mean that Canada and Japan would be at war. I ask the Senator whether it would be so construed.

Mr. PITTMAN. I should take it that if Canada and Japan were at war they would both come under the terms of the embargo.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The Senator has in mind the rather extensive local trade between a State such as Michigan, which borders for something like a thousand miles on Canada, trade between Detroit, for example, and a border city on the other side, such as Windsor. Would the provisions of subsection (b) prevent the shipment of any manufactured goods from Detroit to Windsor, or from one part of Michigan to some part of Ontario, Canada, unless the somewhat onerous credit provisions of subsection (b) of section 2 were imposed?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think there is any distinction. If there were war between Canada and Japan, our Government certainly would not discriminate in favor of either one of those countries.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Then, it would seem to me that subsection (b) ought to be discretionary, instead of mandatory upon the President, because I do not see what relation there could be between the prevention of war between the United States and Japan and a prohibition against a simple trading transaction between Michigan and Canada. It would seem to me that sufficient consideration has not been given to the question of trade between Canada and the United States on the Great Lakes.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is no doubt that there would be some inconvenience attached to it, but we must do one of two things; we have either to give the power to the President to discriminate in favor of Canada in the matter, or we have to give him the power to discriminate when this measure goes into effect, and if so, against whom. Undoubtedly if anything on earth would arouse unfriendliness on the part of a belligerent against us it would be discrimination by our Government in favor of its enemy. We are speaking of a time when war exists, not of peacetimes, and if Canada were engaged in war with a foreign country, and we were at peace with both of them, we would certainly arouse the intense anger and probably the unfriendly disposition of any country against which we discriminated in favor of any other country.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I should think that what the Senator says would be entirely true as to the munitions of war, but I understand trade in munitions of war is prohibited anyway.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Nevada on the amendment has expired.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I presume I have some time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan has time on the amendment.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I should like to continue along this line.

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield the floor. My time is up.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. What I am interested in is a matter of trade in commodities which have no connection with munitions of war, and it seems to me that if subsection (b) were made discretionary and not mandatory the situation would be covered. I certainly shall support any amendment that will bring about that result.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] to the amendment of the committee in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Copeland	Lodge	Pittman
Ashurst	Davis	Logan	Pope
Austin	Dieterich	Lonergan	Radcliffe
Bachman	Ellender	Lundeen	Robinson
Bailey	Frazier	McAdoo	Russell

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] to the amendment in the nature of a substitute reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The amendment of Mr. VANDENBERG is in section 2, to strike out paragraphs (a), (c), and (d), as follows:

(a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations as provided in section 1 of this act and he shall thereafter find that the placing of restrictions on the shipment of certain articles or materials in addition to arms, ammunition, and implements of war from the United States to said belligerents named in the proclamation issued under said section 1, or to a country wherein civil strife has been proclaimed to exist, is deemed necessary to promote the security or preserve the peace or neutrality of the United States or to protect the lives and commerce of nationals of the United States, he shall so proclaim and it shall thereafter be unlawful for any American vessel or aircraft to carry such articles or materials to any belligerent country, or any country wherein civil strife exists, named in said proclamation or proclamations issued under section 1 of this act, or to any other country for transshipment to, or for the use of, such belligerent countries or within such country where civil strife exists. The President shall by proclamation from time to time definitely enumerate said articles and materials which it shall be unlawful for American vessels or aircraft to transport.

(c) The President shall from time to time by proclamation extend such restrictions as are imposed under subsection (a) of this section to other countries as and when they may be declared to become belligerents under proclamations issued under section 1 of this act.

(d) The President may from time to time change, modify, or revoke in whole or in part any proclamations issued by him under subsection (a) of this section.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COPELAND (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON], and will vote. I vote "yea."

I announce that if the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] were present he would vote "yea", and if the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. NYE (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO]. If he were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MINTON. I reannounce the absence of Senators as announced on the previous roll call.

I further announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has a general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] has a pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HUGHES]. If present, the Senator from Maryland would vote "yea", and the Senator from Delaware would vote "nay."

I further announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] has a pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY]. If present and at liberty to vote, the Senator from Montana would vote "yea", and the Senator from Pennsylvania would vote "nay."

I also announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS] is detained in a conference at the White House, and that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] is attending a committee meeting.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that my colleague [Mr. GIBSON] is necessarily absent.

Mr. COPELAND. I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. WAGNER] on account of illness.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 48, as follows:

YEAS—24

Adams	Clark	King	Russell
Austin	Davis	La Follette	Steiwer

So Mr. VANDENBERG's amendment to the amendment of the committee, in the nature of a substitute, was rejected.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, on my amendment I call for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Has the Senator offered the amendment?

Mr. BONE. I thought I had; but, if not, I offer it now, and call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that the amendment has not been stated.

Mr. PITTMAN. I wish to have it stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 10, line 13, after the word "thereunder", it is proposed to insert "or by the owner of the vessel carrying the same."

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Washington that that matter, of course, has been discussed, but it was discussed in connection with the insurance provision. The Senator now simply proposes that in the event of the destruction of an American ship, the owner may not call upon the Government of the United States to make its destruction the basis of claim against the belligerent government, but that he must carry his own insurance. That is what I understand the amendment of the Senator from Washington to mean.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I have spoken on this subject and I should be intruding upon the time of the Senate if I spoke upon it again. I do not know that I used all my time in dealing with the subject.

I wish to say now, in view of the fact that there are more Senators present than when I previously addressed the Senate, that the purpose of this amendment is to put the vessel itself in the same category with the cargo. Before a vote is taken on this matter, it were well to understand that when Senators vote in the affirmative on this joint resolution—and I am going to vote for the joint resolution—Senators say by law that where a cargo——

Mr. PITTMAN. May I interrupt the Senator? The amendment, in the form that the Senator has offered it, is entirely different from the form in which it was presented to the committee. The amendment, as he now offers it, is in entire accord with the whole of the provision; that is, that if the ship carries arms, ammunition, or implements of war contrary to law, or if it carries goods prohibited by the President, in that case there can be no claim for damages. So far as I am concerned, I gladly accept the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] to the amendment of the committee on page 10, line 13.

The amendment to the amendment of the committee, in the nature of a substitute, was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I stated a few moments ago that I regarded subdivisions (a) and (b) of section 2 to constitute one question or problem. I am going to offer an amendment to subdivision (b) to make it discretionary as to the time when it shall go into effect. It seems to me, as the discretion has been lodged in the President with reference to the matter of shipping, that the discretion ought also to be lodged in the President with reference to the time when this portion of the program should go into effect.

The President may deal with a number of questions in determining when subdivision (b) shall go into effect, and, in my opinion, a number of problems naturally and inevitably will arise at the beginning of a war in which European nations are involved and as to which someone should have a discretion as to changing the program with reference to the shipment of goods.

I offer this amendment not because I am in favor of section (b) but because I think that if it goes into the joint resolution it ought to be associated with a discretionary power somewhere. My amendment proposes to insert the words:

> Whenever a state of war has been declared to exist as provided under section 1 of this act and the President deems it necessary to limit or control the exports of this country in order to promote the security or preserve the peace or neutrality of the United States or to protect the lives and commerce of the nationals of the United States, he shall so proclaim, and, thereafter—

Mr. ROBINSON. I inquire where does the Senator propose to insert those words?

Mr. BORAH. I would insert them as a sentence preceding the opening sentence in subdivision (b) on page 9, as a part of section (b).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] to the amendment of the committee in the nature of a substitute. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 9, before the word "It", at the beginning of line 14 and after the letter "(b)", it is proposed to insert the following:

> Whenever a state of war has been declared to exist, as provided under section 1 of this act, and the President deems it necessary to limit or control the exports of this country in order to promote the security or preserve the peace or neutrality of the United States or to protect the lives and commerce of the nationals of the United States, he shall so proclaim, and, thereafter,

And following the words inserted to strike out "It" and insert "it."

Mr. BORAH. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COPELAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote with reference to my pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and its transfer to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON], which will permit me to vote. I vote "yea." I will add that if the Senator from Mississippi were present he would vote "nay", and if the Senator from Vermont were present he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY], the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT] are detained from the Senate because of illness.

The senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] is detained because of a severe cold.

The junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO] is absent attending the funeral of the late Representative Stubbs.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS] is detained in a conference at the White House.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY], the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HUGHES], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN], the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] are unavoidably detained.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has a general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD]. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] has a pair on this question with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HUGHES]. If present and voting, the Senator from Maryland would vote "yea", and the Senator from Delaware would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—31

Adams	Burke	King	Russell
Austin	Davis	Lodge	Smith

So Mr. BORAH's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and ask that it be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment on page 12, section 4, line 7, after the word "states", it is proposed to strike out:

> Provided the American republic is not cooperating with a non-American state or states in such war.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island to the amendment reported by the committee in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, section 4 of the joint resolution is carried over from the previous act, which was passed in 1935. Section 4 relates to the American republics, and reads:

> This act shall not apply to an American republic or republics engaged in war against a non-American state or states—

Then follows the portion which I seek to strike out, namely—> provided the American republic is not cooperating with a non-American state or states in such war.

In other words, under section 4 the embargo provided by the pending measure does not apply to an American republic or republics engaged in war against a non-American state or states, and so forth. I think I can explain the amendment better by giving an example.

The embargo would apply, for example, if two American states were at war and a foreign state like Japan supported one of the American republics at war and Russia supported the other one, and as the outcome of that situation the two foreign governments, Russia and Japan, declared war against each other, in which case, under section 4, as it now reads, the embargo provided would be effective. That may sound like a situation rather unlikely to arise; but I think if we compare that possible situation to the situation which exists in Spain it will not seem so unlikely. That situation in a small way is very similar, because we read in the press that one country is supporting one set of belligerents and another country is supporting the other set of belligerents. There has been a grave question as a result that a general foreign war might develop.

If we had a similar condition in the way I have stated, the exemptions in section 4 to American republics engaged in war would not apply unless the amendment I have offered is agreed to. We would thus be in a position where we could not even furnish them goods, provided there was an embargo put on goods, and we would not be able to help isolating ourselves by the general embargo provisions of the resolution. I am afraid that when this situation is brought more and more to the attention of the rest of the Americas it might have a bad effect on the good feelings which the President has been able to create by his South American tour.

I also feel that withholding this help by us may cause very serious situations to arise and is bound to create bad feeling with our sister republics when they are in trouble. It also may result, and would result, that the country which had the dominant sea power, such as Japan, would be of tremendous advantage to the state of which it was an ally. I cannot help but feel that the result might be that great concessions would be granted to that foreign power, concessions which might even go into military matters and force this country to take a stand which might readily lead it into war.

Mr. President, in all these cases we get back to control of the sea and the importance of sea power and its dominance. I feel that this is another example of where the pending joint resolution, the purpose of which is to try to prevent war or keep us as much as possible away from war, is liable to lead us into more and more dangerous situations which may be more provocative of war than the policy of the freedom of the seas. I think this is a striking example of just that fact.

So much for my amendment. Before I resume my seat I should like to say a few words on the general subject of the joint resolution.

Mr. President, if we should be in a war ourselves, this embargo policy, this policy of cash-and-carry or whatever it may be called, is bound to be used as a precedent against us when we are seeking materials from neutral countries if we shall be at war ourselves. I cannot overemphasize how serious the situation was during the World War. I recall the worry and anxiety through which we went and through which our allies went when we were having difficulty getting nitrates from Chile to Europe. We were very, very short of nitrates and so were our allies. The result was, if I recollect correctly, and I am speaking entirely from memory, that we even insisted, and that is a mild term to use, that neutral shipping carry the nitrate to Europe. That nitrate situation resulted in our building Muscle Shoals. The nitrate situation today is not what it was in those days, but we still have the question of tin, we still have the question of tungsten, we still have the question of rubber.

With new inventions, we never can tell what new developments will require in new minerals or chemicals that we may not be able to produce. Therefore, I feel that that is also a very important consideration for our self-protection when we consider this departure from the well-established principles of international law.

I feel increasingly that way when I see how the great nations of the world are arming. I know that the Senate wishes to come to a vote, and I am not going to take up the time of the Senate in making a long speech; so I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article which appeared in the New York Times today, showing the proposed program of Great Britain as to increasing its naval strength.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACHMAN in the chair). Without objection, the article will be printed in the RECORD.

The article is as follows:

[From the New York Times of Mar. 3, 1937]

TWENTY-FIVE CAPITAL SHIPS FORECAST IN BRITAIN'S BIG NEW NAVY—ADDITIONS AND REDESIGNING WILL NEARLY DOUBLE FLEET'S STRENGTH—AIR FORCE OF 5,300 PLANES BY 1939 SEEN

By Hanson W. Baldwin

LONDON, March 2.—A fleet of 25 capital ships by 1942, with 70 or more cruisers and hundreds of smaller craft, and an air armada totaling, reserves included, at least 5,300 planes by 1939, are predicted here on the eve of the presentation to Parliament tomorrow of the naval estimates for the next fiscal year.

The Admiralty's figures—the first of this year's budget requests by the three fighting services—will be followed with the publication on Friday of the air estimates and the announcement on March 17 of the army's budget. When the mass of details is analyzed it is expected to reveal Britain's determination not only to dominate the North Sea but also to strengthen her Far Eastern position, safeguard her trade routes on all the seas, and become supreme in the skies of western Europe.

"Tommy Atkins", the backbone of the British Army, will not get so much attention as his comrades in arms, but the war-office budget, in addition to continuing the mechanization program, will include inducements for solving one of the most serious problems of the army—the lag in recruiting.

Specifically, the navy's estimates will include funds for laying down the three battleships, seven cruisers, and two aircraft carriers forecast in last month's White Paper relating to defense expenditures. Inferentially, the estimates will mark the emergence and rapid growth of a new British navy, the greatest since the war days.

With the three battleships that the current budget provides for and two others laid down 2 months ago—the King George V and the Prince of Wales, 35,000 tonners costing £8,000,000 each, with speeds of 28 to 30 knots and 14-inch guns—Britain will have, in 3 or 4 years, 5 capital ships to be added to the 15 she now possesses. But she is expected to construct at least five others before 1942, as well as many cruisers and smaller ships.

In addition Britain is completely reconstructing—and too much emphasis cannot be laid on this point—her old capital ships and even cruisers on a scale and with a thoroughness that few persons in the United States, even those conversant with naval affairs, dream of.

In effect, therefore, Britain is building a whole fleet of new capital ships so that by 1942, if her intended program is not interrupted, she will have probably 25 or more such ships, some of which, with supporting units of other types, may be sent to Singapore.

WILL NEARLY DOUBLE STRENGTH

As far as can be foreseen now, Britain is likely to add, including the more than 80 ships now building or appropriated for, about 600,000 tons of fighting ships to her present tonnage totaling approximately 1,192,000. Probably it is not an exaggeration to say that because of the redesigning of old ships and the great improvement in design of the new ones, the fighting strength of the British fleet will be nearly doubled in the next 5 years.

The ships being built or converted range all the way from tiny 60-foot, 17-ton, wooden coastal motorboats carrying torpedoes to antiaircraft vessels of the Coventry and Curlew type, peculiar to the British Navy. The 5,200-ton cruiser Aurora, now being completed with six 6-inch guns and some 17 assorted antiaircraft weapons, and the Tribal class of superdestroyers, with eight 4.7-inch guns, eight smaller weapons, and four torpedo tubes on an 1,850-ton displacement, are among the noteworthy fleet additions.

The fleet air arm is to be expanded from approximately 170 ship-borne aircraft to 217 during 1937 and eventually is to be at least doubled.

NEW BASES PLANNED

For the growing fleet Britain is seeking to establish new bases and strengthen old ones against air attack. At Singapore, upon which several million more pounds probably will be expended before its completion, the present inadequate antiaircraft defenses will be strengthened and the vulnerable oil-storage tanks will be protected.

Malta is unlikely to be abandoned as a base, although Britain in case of war may exercise remote control over the Mediterranean by blocking it at both ends with her ships based at ports safely beyond the range of most European aerial armadas. For this purpose and to prepare an alternate route to the East she is quietly investigating the probability of bases on the east and west coasts of Africa, at Cape Town, where some work has already been started; at the Maldive Islands and at the Chagos Islands in the Indian Ocean.

At home Milfordhaven is being discussed as a possible fleet base to supplement the bases on the south and east coasts, which have served Britain for hundreds of years but which now, because of the seven league boots of the airplane, are uncomfortably close to the Continent. Even Scapa Flow and Rosyth, famed war bases, are classed as dangerous and possibly untenable in any future war and bases along the west coast of Scotland and the east and west coasts of Ireland are being mentioned.

The British Navy's strength is and will be in increasing measure its great number of ships and bases; its weakness, its small number of ship-borne aircraft, and the vulnerability of some of its bases to air attack. In addition the ghosts of Jutland and Invergordon still walk the quarterdeck. But the fleet's morale, weakened by these events as well as by the withdrawal from Malta during the Italian trouble and Prime Minister Stanley Baldwin's admission that the fleet could not control the Mediterranean, lately has been strengthened by the building program.

AIR STRENGTH IMPRESSIVE

The Air Ministry's estimates are expected to range from £70,000,000 to £80,000,000, far less than the navy's, but fully as impressive when analyzed because they will provide funds to continue the process of making Britain supreme in the air.

Her first-line air strength today, including all planes attached to operating units at home, overseas, and in the fleet air arm, totals 1,565 planes, according to the latest authentic information. This is, surprisingly enough, some 365 more first-line planes than Germany is credited with here, and larger, it is contended, than any other European air fleet except the Russian.

The British problem is not one of either personnel or quality of planes and engines but primarily one of quantity production. There have been delays in the past 7 years or more between the first specifications for a plane and the time the plane took its place in an operating squadron, but that is over now.

The exact production rate is a closely guarded secret, but it is recalled that Britain built more than 10,000 planes in the last year of the World War. Today the Bristol plant alone employs more than 8,000 persons, with the various Hawker plants employing probably 12,000 to 14,000 more.

RATE BEING SPEEDED

Production, however, has barely started—in fact, has not started on certain of the best new types—and it is unlikely that all 12 factories that turn out planes and the 3 principal engine makers are producing today at a rate of more than 1,000 to 1,500 planes annually. The rate is being vastly speeded up, however. When it reaches its peak in the late summer or fall, some estimate Britain will be building 17 planes daily, and even conservative estimates place production at from 2,000 to 3,000 annually.

In any case it seems certain that Britain will have at least 5,300 planes by 1939, and one estimate from a well-informed source indicates that, including training planes and reserves, she will have an armada of 8,000. The announced intention is to build up the metropolitan or home air force squadron to 1,750 by that time, with 450 planes overseas and at least 450 more with the fleet.

The percentage of reserves to be accumulated behind the first-line squadrons is another closely guarded secret, but it is believed certain that Britain figures on 100-percent reserves for all bombers and fighters, with some estimates of available bomber replacements ranging as high as 200 or 300 percent. She is building planes at a ratio of two bombers to every fighter; but, even so, experts believe that the plane wastage in the next war will be tremendous, and that the force with which the war is started will be wiped out within a month. Hence the importance of enormous reserves, which there is no doubt Britain is accumulating.

AIR FORCE FACES PROBLEMS

The air force itself as well as the plane industry for the next year must face problems of expansion, with old squadrons constantly being broken up and new ones formed, pilots being trained, and new planes being tested. Some planes in active operation today are obsolescent types, but most compare rather favorably with the planes of other nations, and the newest types, most of which are not yet in production, are believed to be superior in most characteristics to nearly anything in Europe. Some of these are here briefly described:

Supermarine spitfire single-seater fighter: This plane is described in official quarters as capable of breaking the landplane speed record. Elsewhere its speed is more conservatively estimated as a top of 346 miles an hour, probably the world's fastest military machine. Not in production. It is estimated the craft will have an hour and a quarter's endurance and be armed with eight machine guns firing through the propeller and faired into the wings.

Hawker hurricane single-seater fighter: This is to be in production within about a month. Two hours' endurance, 306-mile speed, at 30,000-foot ceiling, and eight guns, each firing at a rate of 600 rounds a minute.

Bristol Blenheim medium bomber middle wing monoplane: Now coming into production, this machine is equipped with retractable landing gear and tail skid. Two guns, one fired from a revolving turret aft in the fuselage, the other faired into the port wing. Carries two 500-pound bombs in fuselage bomb compartments and smaller bombs in wing compartments under the flaps. Speed, around 300 miles an hour. Range, 1,000 miles. Cost, $60,000 each.

Handley-Page Harrow heavy bomber: Speed, 180 miles an hour. Range, 2,000 miles. Coming into production.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, that is Great Britain's program. We do not know, as yet, what Japan's increased program is going to be; but the indications are that she, too, will increase her general building program, and that undoubtedly she will very greatly increase her submarine program.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Rhode Island on the amendment has expired.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I shall now speak on the joint resolution itself.

If this joint resolution becomes the law I cannot help feeling that the American public will be lulled into a false sense of security. I believe that these embargoes—which, as the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] very well pointed out today, did not work in the old days—will so lull us into a false feeling of security that we will not go forward with a proper defense, a proper building up of our Navy, so as to have a navy second to none, and so that, no matter what happens, America will be able to defend herself.

Personally, I do not feel that I can vote for this joint resolution, with its implications that America is unwilling to fight for her rights on the high seas if necessary. As I said before in the debate, I think all of us desire peace. Every thinking Senator—and every Senator has given this question great thought—desires peace with honor; but I feel that the way to get peace is to have the rest of the world know that America is going to be able to defend herself, and to see that her rights are protected, if necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask to have the amendment stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 12, line 7, it is proposed to strike out the following words:

provided the American republic is not cooperating with a non-American state or states in such war.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will state that that language is part of the existing law. It has been on the statute books now for 2 years. It was suggested by the State Department. I think the Secretary of State perhaps knows more about the feeling in South America than in any other country, and he advocated the retention of that language in the joint resolution, so I am against the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] to the amendment of the committee in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment to the amendment of the committee in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I submit a proposed amendment and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 7, beginning with line 17, it is proposed to strike out through line 19, in the following words:

(d) The President, by proclamation, shall definitely enumerate the arms, ammunition, and implements of war, the export of which is prohibited by this act.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

(d) The arms, ammunition, and implements of war, the export of which is prohibited by this act, shall be those enumerated in the President's proclamation no. 2163 of April 10, 1936.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, as I stated in my opening address on this subject, the President has construed the meaning of the phrase "arms, ammunition, and implements of war", and has given a definition to it in several proclamations. My suggestion at that time was that I thought the Department was continuing to give the same definition, but personally I should be perfectly willing to accept any amendment which would refer to the proclamation made by the President.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, do I understand that the amendment requires the President to specify the articles? What is the amendment which the Senator from North Dakota offers?

Mr. NYE. The amendment would fix the definition of arms, ammunition, and implements of war as it was established by the President in his proclamation of April 10, 1936.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator wish to have a rigid definition fixed at a certain date?

Mr. NYE. I am inclined to think that a rigid definition is better than no definition at all.

Mr. BORAH. The way we are dealing with the question of arms, ammunition, and implements of war, a definition today would not be worth much at some future date.

Mr. NYE. It is true that Congress might be called upon occasionally to add to the list as it is now defined.

Mr. PITTMAN. The President took that definition because it is contained in the Geneva convention of 1925, which we ratified; that is all.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] a question. Under the Senator's amendment, if a new implement of war or new arms were manufactured, they could not then be included by the President in the specification?

Mr. NYE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. POPE. And if new war machines were devised and designed, they could not be added by the President and would not be subject to the embargo?

Mr. NYE. Until Congress granted authority to add them. By the same token, a President now could greatly limit the number of commodities covered by the definition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] to the amendment of the committee in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I desire to make an inquiry of the Senator from Nevada as to a matter of terminology. In line 18, page 7, the joint resolution reads:

The President * * * shall * * * enumerate the arms, ammunition—

And so forth.

I am wondering if it would not be more accurate if we were to say "shall designate or specify." To my mind, the word "enumerate" seems to mean to number.

Mr. PITTMAN. That language has been stricken out and new language put in.

I have some formal amendments to offer.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine offers an amendment to the amendment of the committee which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 11, line 6, after the word "Government", it is proposed to insert the words "or any faction or group engaged in said civil strife or of any representative thereof or of any person participating therein."

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, the text of the joint resolution prohibits, in the event of civil strife, any person within the United States purchasing, selling or exchanging bonds, securities or other obligations of the government of the country wherein the civil strife is proceeding. It seems to me we ought to go beyond that and prevent a citizen of the United States making advances of any character to any faction or group of citizens taking part in the civil strife.

Specifically, and for illustration, let us take the case of Spain. The Government of Spain, I take it, is confined to a narrow area. The joint resolution as it now reads would prohibit this character of aid to that Government, but it would not prevent any citizen or any interest in the United States advancing loans of any character or in any amount to the other faction engaged in the civil strife in Spain. I think that in order to accomplish what we desire to accomplish—that is, avoid trouble to ourselves from internal conflicts—the prohibition should be enlarged.

I think the principle of the amendment is sound. I am not so sure the language is what it should be, but I assume the measure, if it shall be passed, will go to conference, and I think the subject matter of this amendment ought to be before the conferees. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations will accept the amendment.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the present provision deals with governments and with governments alone. I cannot conceive how we can provide any definite prohibition against the giving of credit or the lending of money to factions in a country. Let us assume that we have recognized the government of a country wherein there is civil strife. That is a government, and we can prohibit a government from having credit in this country. But I think it would be administratively impossible of enforcement if we should make it unlawful for any notes or bonds or credits of a faction or a group of men to be circulated in this country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, if no further material amendments are to be offered, I should like to offer a few formal amendments to the language of the joint resolution merely to correct errors.

The first amendment I offer is on page 6, in line 22, to strike out the comma and the words "or possessions of the United States."

There is a general clause in the joint resolution which provides that when the words "United States" are used in the measure they shall include its Territories and possessions. Therefore I propose wherever the words "or possessions of the United States" are found in the joint resolution that they be stricken out so that the language will be uniform.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN. I send to the desk several other amendments I desire to propose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendments.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 7, line 13, after the words "United States", it is proposed to strike out the comma and the words "or possessions of the United States."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment to the committee amendment was, on page 7, line 23, after the words "United States", to strike out the comma and the words "or any of its possessions."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment to the committee amendment was, on page 15, line 15, after the word "United States", to strike out the comma and the words "or possessions of the United States."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment to the committee amendment was, on page 18, line 19, after the word "United States", to strike out the comma and the words "or any of its possessions."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment to the committee amendment was, on page 19, line 2, after the words "United States", to strike out the comma and the words "or one of its possessions."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment to the committee amendment was, on page 19, line 10, after the words "United States", to strike out the comma and the words "or of its possessions."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment to the committee amendment was, on page 19, line 18, after the words "United States", to strike out the words "or any of its possessions."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment to the committee amendment was, on page 20, line 15, after the words "United States", to strike out the words "or to any of its possessions."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN. On page 9, in line 23, we find the word "article." In other places the words "articles or materials" are used. At this place I move to insert the words "or material."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN. I send several other amendments to the desk which I ask may be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendments to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The first amendment to the committee amendment was, on page 9, line 4, to strike out the words "American vessel or aircraft" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "vessel or aircraft of the United States."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment to the committee amendment was, on page 10, line 9, to strike out the word "an" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "a", to strike out the word "American", and on line 10, after the word "aircraft", to insert the words "of the United States."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment to the committee amendment was, on page 17, line 5, to strike out the word "American", and after the word "aircraft", to insert the words "of the United States."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment to the committee amendment was, on page 20, line 23, to strike out the words "American vessel" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "vessel of the United States."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment to the committee amendment was, on page 10, line 9, after the word "articles", to insert the words "or materials."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk several other formal amendments to the committee amendment, which I ask to have acted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendments to the amendment.

The first amendment to the committee amendment was, on page 10, line 1, to strike out the words "American citizens" and insert in lieu thereof the words "citizens of the United States."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment to the committee amendment was, on page 10, line 5, to strike out the words "American citizen" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "citizen of the United States."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment to the committee amendment was, on page 20, line 9, after the word "citizen", to insert the words "of the United States."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment to the committee amendment was, on page 20, line 14, after the word "citizen", to insert the words "of the United States."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk two more proposed amendments to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will state the amendments to the amendment.

The first amendment to the committee amendment was, on page 10, line 8, to strike out the word "exportation" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "export."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment to the committee amendment was, on page 15, line 5, to strike out the word "exportation" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "the export."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN. On page 10, line 7 is inserted at the wrong place. I move to amend, on page 10, after line 5, by inserting the words "of right, title, or interest in such articles or materials" and to strike out those words where they appear on line 7.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN. On page 21, line 3, I move to strike out the word "ammunitions" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ammunition."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I also offer an amendment for the purpose of having the act referred to by a short title in the future so as not to make it necessary to repeat the long title which we find at the beginning of the joint resolution as proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment to the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In the committee amendment at the end of the joint resolution it is proposed to insert the following:

"SEC. 15. This act may be cited as the 'Peace Act of 1937.'"

SEC. 2. The title of such joint resolution of August 31, 1935, as amended, is amended to read as follows: "An act prohibiting the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries, prohibiting the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels and aircraft of the United States for the use of belligerent countries, providing for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war, prohibiting travel by citizens of the United States on belligerent ships during war, prohibiting the arming of merchant vessels of the United States, and for other purposes."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there are no further amendments to be proposed, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, neutrality legislation is designed for times of crisis when without it we would be at the mercy of great surges of public feeling, when our first need is some measure of restraint. It probably is not possible at the present time to set up legislative enactments which would endure for any considerable period of time in event of a prolonged foreign war. Such measures as may now be enacted, therefore, will probably be tentative in nature, but will show the desire of the vast majority of our citizens to remain at peace with all the world.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to say a word because of the vote which I shall cast on the pending joint resolution.

I stated in the opening of the debate that the provisions of the joint resolution relating to the shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war and those relating to loans and credits and traveling on belligerent ships I thought sound and that they had my hearty approval. I stated also that in my opinion subdivisions (a) and (b) of section 2 brought about an entire change of our national policy, and that I was unable to support those provisions. I have to decide at this time, therefore, whether I should support the joint resolution with those provisions in it, notwithstanding the fact that it contains many provisions which I approve.

Overshadowing this entire matter, as I see it, and of more importance to me than all other matters which have been discussed, is the fact that we are apparently preparing to take leave of a policy as old as the Government and inextricably interwoven with the security and the prosperity and the honor of this Nation, and with its standing and its reputation among the nations of the world. I do not know how others have looked upon the debates and the proposals, but they seem to me to indicate that we are headed for nothing less than a complete abandonment of our rights at sea—to take our ships out upon the ocean and to carry foodstuffs and other material absolutely essential to the human family. I know that that is not the specific purpose of those in charge of the measure, but it seems to me to be the ultimate objective, although not the admitted and specific aim.

In contending for our rights to carry those things which the human family has to have in order to live we are not contending for our rights alone. We are contending for the rights and the interests of small nations and weak peoples everywhere. We are contending for the fundamental rights of humanity, the right to use the sea for the carrying of those things without which the human family would perish. We are contending for the right to carry those things without which civilization could not exist. Thomas Jefferson said in the beginning of this Government, because nations go to war it does not diminish the rights of those who wish to remain at peace. I cannot accept the theory that you can purchase peace by surrendering the things which are indispensable to the health and happiness and economic welfare of our entire people and to the strength and power of the Nation.

In that remarkable letter sent out by the late Secretary of State, Mr. Lansing, in October 1915, to the British Government may be found these words:

> This task of championing the integrity of neutral rights which have received the sanction of the civilized world against the lawless conduct of belligerents arising out of the bitterness of the great conflict which is now wasting the countries of Europe the United States unhesitatingly assumes, and to this accomplishment of that task it will devote its energy, exercising always—
> Said he—
> that impartiality which from the outbreak of the war it has sought to exercise in its relations with the warring nations.

Mr. President, notwithstanding the experience which followed that declaration, and notwithstanding the break-down in the program which was there announced, in dealing with this matter I think we ought to keep that principle at the top of the page.

Of course, there come times when all law is interrupted, domestic law and international law; when all law breaks down; but when we return to peace we do not retain the principles and practices which guided us under such conditions. The interruption of national duty does not put an end to the duty. The violation of neutral law does not of itself destroy the law any more than the countless murders which we see recorded in the daily press destroy the law for the protection of human life. The trampling upon great international rights in the hour of emergency or danger does not destroy those rights, and when we return to a state of peace we ought to return to those conditions and rights, and we ought to maintain them insofar as possible for us to do so. And particularly I would not announce in advance that we stand ready to leave the sea with the first coming of the storm. I would not be impetuous to advertise the surrender of the most vital things connected with national welfare. Our first leaders did not believe that there was either peace or honor, security or righteousness, in giving over the seas solely and voluntarily to the chaos and despoliation of belligerents. They insisted—and who will challenge it now—that the sea is the highway of those who love peace and who want to carry the things which contribute, not to death and destruction, but to the comforts and happiness of mankind—nature's great thoroughfare to be devoted to the commerce and advancement of the peoples and nations of the world.

I realize that any policy may lead to controversy and may lead to war, but what I am contending for is that no nation in advance should indicate its willingness to surrender its just and essential rights in order to maintain peace. I do not believe it brings peace. I believe in the first place it brings contempt, and in the second place assault.

I know that my friends say that that policy is a war policy; that it means conflict, that it means war. I do not look upon a policy which dedicates us to the carrying of foodstuffs and the things necessary for civilization as a war policy. It is a peace policy. It is a humanitarian policy. It is a policy which some nations must carry out or all will perish.

We are not going to surrender permanently our essential rights. We are not going to impede or embarrass permanently access to the foreign markets for our farmers and for our miners and for our manufacturers. The people will not let us do so.

In my opinion, Mr. President, after we have gotten far enough away from the World War—from the lessons which it was supposed to teach but did not—to formulate a sound and reasonable policy, we will come back to the proposition that things which are useful only for destruction, adapted only for the taking of human lives, we will neither sell nor ship, but those things which are essential to our national well-being, for the prosperity of our people, and indispensable to the happiness and comfort and life of all people, we will carry. That is bound to be the permanent policy of this great Nation of ours. You and I may pursue a different course but there will come a time when these boys we are professing to protect will themselves assert the rights of this Republic and see to it that other nations respect those rights.

Therefore, much as I dislike to disagree with the able chairman who has worked industriously, I do not feel at this time I should endorse a policy which seems to me to surrender these essential principles, and a policy in which our interests as a people are so deeply involved. Whatever else we do in this legislation, let us keep unimpaired our right to carry our commerce to whatever part of the world American initiative and American genius may win their way. The United States can do this thing, and it will in the end mean more for humanity, more for peace than a thoughtless surrender of our indisputable rights.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass? On this question the yeas and nays have been demanded and ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COPELAND (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. LONERGAN (when Mr. MALONEY's name was called). My colleague, the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] has been called from the Chamber on official business. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). Again referring to my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], who is necessarily absent, I am advised that if he were present he would vote as I am about to vote. I am, therefore, at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BARKLEY (when Mr. ROBINSON's name was called). The senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has been temporarily called from the Chamber on official business. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. COPELAND (when Mr. WAGNER's name was called). My colleague the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is detained from the Senate on account of illness. I am advised that if present and voting he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. AUSTIN. My colleague the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] is necessarily absent. He is paired on this question with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. If present, my colleague would vote "nay", and I am advised the Senator from Arkansas would vote "yea."

Mr. BYRNES. The junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber because of important business. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MINTON. The junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY], the Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY], the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HUGHES], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] are unavoidably detained.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] is detained in an important committee meeting.

The junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO] is absent attending the funeral of the late Representative STUBBS.

The senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] is detained because of a severe cold.

I am advised that if present and voting these Senators would vote "yea."

The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] is detained on important public business.

The junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY], the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT] are detained because of illness.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has a general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

The result was announced—yeas 63, nays 6, as follows:

So the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 51) was passed.

On motion of Mr. PITTMAN, the title was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution to amend the joint resolution entitled 'Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war', approved August 31, 1935, as amended."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Megill, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 84. An act to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Ralph Charles Stuart; and

S. 989. An act to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Clarence Quinton Pair.

EXTENSION OF AUTHORITY TO NEGOTIATE TRADE AGREEMENTS—PRINTING OF HEARINGS

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, by direction of the Committee on Printing, I report back favorably the resolution (S. Res. 87) submitted by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] on March 1, 1937, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 87) was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That, in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the Printing Act, approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Finance of the Senate be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed 1,000 additional copies of the hearings held before said committee during the first session of the Seventy-fifth Congress on the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 96) entitled "Joint Resolution to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended."

ORDER FOR CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of morning business tomorrow the calendar shall be called for the consideration of unobjected bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none. and the agreement is entered into.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, March 4, 1937, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 3, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, give us understanding that we may learn Thy commandments and let Thy merciful kindness be our comfort. Oh, may we praise the Lord for His goodness and declare the wonders He doeth for the children of men. We thank Thee that Thou art He that doeth abundantly more than we ask or think. The Lord God help us to add to our faith virtue; to virtue knowledge; to knowledge temperance; to temperance patience; to patience godliness; to godliness brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness charity. We pray Thee, our Father, to let Thy holy word encourage endeavor, inspire effort, and direct us in thought and in deed. Thine shall be the glory forever. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an address delivered over the radio by our colleague the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LUCKEY].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INTERSTATE TRAFFIC IN BITUMINOUS COAL

Mr. GREENWOOD, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following resolution for printing under the rule, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

House Resolution 146

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 4985, a bill to regulate interstate commerce in bituminous coal, and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 4 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I presume this is for the consideration of the so-called Vinson coal bill.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman tell us when he expects to call that up in the House?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I understand the program is that it will not be called up before next Tuesday. We hope that it will be called up on that day.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Then it will not be called up on Friday? There have been some rumors that it would be.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. It was the plan of the committee to take it up immediately either tomorrow or Friday, and the Rules Committee was prepared to take it up on Friday; but, due to certain circumstances, and in the absence of Members, and to accommodate them, I understand that it is being postponed until Tuesday.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. And it will not come before that anyway?

Mr. GREENWOOD. No.

BONDHOLDERS' REORGANIZATION COMMITTEES

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for a moment to make an announcement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, it is planned to call up House resolution extending the life of the select committee to investigate real estate bondholders' reorganization committees.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Could the gentleman tell us then what is going to happen to the naval appropriation bill?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I refer that question to the majority leader.

Mr. RAYBURN. General debate will be taken up immediately following the consideration of the rule to which the gentleman from New York refers.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. How much general debate are we going to have on the naval appropriation bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. It was expected to conclude general debate in a day. Just exactly what effect the taking out of an hour or an hour and a half on this resolution will have upon general debate, I could not say.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The debate on the Sabath resolution will probably take 2 hours, because there will be a roll call.

Mr. RAYBURN. I understand there is only 1 hour of debate under the rule.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Is it the purpose to try to finish the consideration of the naval appropriation bill this week?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; it is.

THE ROOSEVELT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow the majority side of the House is going to celebrate the 4 long years of the Roosevelt administration by giving a $100 banquet at the Mayflower Hotel. I understand that many tickets can be had for this banquet at $100 per. I thought perhaps I might receive an invitation, but I did not get one. I did receive one to the Willard Hotel at $10 per, but as Mrs. Roosevelt will be there, I think they made too much difference in the prices. They are discriminating too much between Mr. Roosevelt at the Mayflower at $100 and Mrs. Roosevelt at the Willard at $10, so I am afraid neither dinner will be worth the money, so I will not attend either one.

I want to refer to some things that have happened in the last long 4 years, and I wish somebody in the House of Representatives would get the answer from the Chief Executive. Let us go back over the 4 long years of the Roosevelt administration. When Mr. Roosevelt came into office the national debt of this Government was $19,487,000,000. On February 26 last the national debt was $34,599,000,000. Mr. Roosevelt has increased the national debt in 4 years $15,112,000,000. In 1932 when Mr. Roosevelt was making his campaign speeches he deplored the fact that the last year, the Hoover administration was going into debt, and he talked about the "3 long years."

I want to tell you gentlemen that you will have a hard time soon, talking of the 4 long years that you have now passed through. Mr. Hoover cannot hold a candle to Mr. Roosevelt when it comes to spending the taxpayers' money. Your national debt has increased $3,750,000,000 each year, and I should like to have Mr. Roosevelt explain that enormous spending to the people of this country at the banquet Thursday night. While he deplored it under another administration, he now has put his administration to shame, so far as enormous expenditures are concerned, and every day that you read your National Treasury statement, you will find that Mr. Roosevelt is running into the red millions of dollars. He is spending practically two dollars for each dollar he receives in revenues. This has been going on ever since he has been President and is getting worse instead of better.

Take the statement of the Federal Government issued by your own Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau, wherein Mr. Roosevelt said at the beginning of this year we are fast approaching a balanced Budget. Let me call your attention to the statement of February 26. You will find that Mr. Roosevelt has expended this year over $2,041,000,000 more than the receipts. Let him explain that, if you want to celebrate tomorrow night his 4 years in office. Have him explain to you why he condemned spending in 1932 and ask him why he is the greatest spender in all history of our Nation. Let him tell you why he does not practice what he preached.

Now, where are we heading? I have here in my hand a book published by the W. P. A., where they took a census of the unemployed. On January 15 over 6,402,000 were unemployed, according to this book. Then, in a statement made by Mr. Green, of the American Federation of Labor, on February 27, in one of the Washington papers, he is quoted as saying there were 10,432,317 unemployed on February 27. Mr. Green says there were as many unemployed on February 27 as there were when Mr. Roosevelt came into office in 1933, March 4. Let Mr. Roosevelt explain that to you and the American people. His promise to put people back to work is not carried out.

Now, you are increasing the national debt $15,000,000,000 in 4 years or to the extent that it will break down the Federal Government, and you have not put men back on the pay roll of industry. Let Mr. Roosevelt explain that. How can he celebrate such practices? When you men come to celebrate tomorrow night at this $100 banquet (an exorbitant price to pay when people are hungry), just remember some of these things you are celebrating. It seems to me to a thoughtful person you would hold your head in shame.

Two or three weeks ago the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations made the statement in the Hall that he was afraid the appropriations this year would approach those of last year, which were over $10,000,000,000. He said he hoped he would be able to keep them down; that he would do everything in his power to do so. The chairman is now in his grave. Let us revere his memory. Last week I called attention to the fact that there were 10 men in this House who were responsible for these enormous expenditures in the House. I am going to reduce that number to two, that is, the Speaker of the House and the majority leader.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. RICH. I will extend my remarks and give some more of this information.

Mr. Speaker, we have passed three appropriation bills this session as follows: First emergency for $789,000,000; independent offices, $1,140,313,398; Treasury and Post Office, $1,500,955,151; a total of $3,429,268,549. You will consider the Navy tomorrow for over $500,000,000, and we have the other regular appropriation bills and any deficiency bills that the departments will present. You heard of the Wagner housing bill for $1,500,000,000. You heard Mr. Ickes say he wanted $3,000,000,000 for P. W. A. Well, these I have enumerated will require over $8,500,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, I predict this Congress will appropriate more money than any session in the history of the Nation, much over ten billion.

Mr. Speaker, I predict, and if we do, Mr. Speaker, you and the majority leader are responsible. You share the greatest responsibility of any two Members of Congress. Why do I say so, Mr. Speaker? Well, just because your responsibility to the people is greater because you have greater power in this House than any two men in it. You could have them cut down the expenditures if you choose to do so, I am sure. Will you do it, Mr. Speaker, or will you let this Congress run wild as did the Seventy-fourth Congress at both sessions?

The Democratic platform as well as the Republican in 1932 called for a balanced Budget, also the platform of 1936 of the Democratic Party reads as follows:

> We are determined to reduce the expense of government. We are being aided therein by the recession in unemployment. As the requirements of relief decline and national income advances—

And so forth—

> Our retrenchment, tax, and recovery programs thus reflect our firm determination to achieve a balanced Budget and the reduction of the national debt at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Speaker, this majority cannot and never will balance the Budget if you do not change your plans and chart another course with good, sound-thinking Americans who will do what they say they will, who will make their word good to the American people. I am certainly out with people who promise one thing and do another. Men who take oaths to support our Constitution and then try to tear down our Government. Men who think more of their party than they think of their country. Men who think more of their job as Congressman than they think of their country. Men who would set up a dictator rather than have a President, a Congress, and a Court. This House is just a rubber stamp for the President, so the people of the country say it is, and I guess they are right. Now the President wants to be six voices in the Supreme Court, and God grant that the power will never be given to him or any other one man to name six Supreme Court Justices by any one President. Too much power for any one good man, and I know it is too much for a poor man. So why take the chance? In your celebration at the $100 dinner tomorrow, remember, America for Americans. Both Democrats and Republicans, both rich and poor, both black and white.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend by own remarks and insert in connection therewith two items appearing in newspapers in regard to the life and service of the late Honorable James P. Buchanan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the life of the late Honorable JAMES P. BUCHANAN, and include therein a resolution drawn and a statement made by a county judge in my county.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

SHIPMENT OF NITRATE TO SPAIN

Mr. BERNARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is Calendar Wednesday. There are many committees which would like to have at least one Wednesday during this session of Congress in which to have considered bills reported by those committees. I will not object to this request, but in the name of our committee and the committees that are to follow, which deserve this consideration, given to them by the rules of the House, I will be forced to object hereafter.

I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. BERNARD. Mr. Speaker, I have a telegram which, in my humble opinion, is of major importance. I am going to read it, and I hope the membership will give it due consideration:

> We, 300 American citizens assembled at 6 Byron Street, Boston, Mass., Sunday, February 23, to discuss the action of the crew of the British freighter Linaria, anchored in Boston, in refusing to proceed to Virginia for a load of nitrate for the rebel forces in Spain, recall your lone stand against the neutrality law which was jammed through Congress to prevent shipment of airplanes to legitimate Government of Spain. Urge you to raise in Congress question of placing nitrate on the list of banned articles and thus prevent aid to Franco.
> REV. DONALD G. LOTHROP,
> Chairman, Greater Boston Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy.

You will remember how anxious and determined we were in placing an embargo against the democratically elected government in Spain. We broke a precedent which had been in our country for 150 years. For the first time in our history we placed an embargo against a friendly, democratically elected government. Here we do not seem to take exception to the fact that nitrate is used in manufacturing the most deadly explosive known in modern warfare, and we are allowing nitrate to be sent to the rebel forces in Spain.

Some of you may say that nitrate can be used as a fertilizer. Surely none of my colleagues will think that the American people are so naive as to believe that nitrate is requested by the rebel forces in Spain to be used as fertilizer. We know that Spanish soil today is watered and fertilized with human flesh and blood, the flesh and blood of innocent women and children, the flesh and blood of those who have the courage to battle for democracy.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that so far, in my humble opinion, knowingly or unknowingly, we have bowed to the forces of fascism in America; and I sincerely hope that those who are in control of this House, those who are close to the administration, will see to it, in the name of fair play, in the name of justice, that an embargo is placed on nitrate to the rebel forces. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute, and I am quite sure the gentleman from New York will let me do that.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the gentleman has requested 1 minute only and that this perhaps will be the last request for time, I shall be very glad to yield to my colleague.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I asked for 1 minute in order to ask the majority leader if we could not have some assurance about the length of the debate on the Navy bill. It seems to me, in view of the arming of Great Britain, Japan, and Italy, as announced in the press in the last few days, it is highly important that we should discuss this bill to know exactly what our own policy should be; and I think we should be assured that we shall have at least 8 hours of debate.

Mr. RAYBURN. I may state to the gentleman from New York that no member of the subcommittee handling the bill has asked for any such time as he suggests. The only time that has been asked is that general debate be completed tomorrow.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] is spokesman for our side on that committee. I should like to ask him what his view is in the matter of time.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one-half minute longer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I think, frankly, that there ought to be ample debate. Members have come to me with requests that total a couple of hours in addition to those that were given to the chairman of the subcommittee. I think this is a bill on which we should have ample debate.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. May I make the observation, Mr. Speaker, that too long general debate is not for the best interest of the House, when we have only 15 to 50 Members on the floor. We would be much better off with shorter general debate and unlimited debate under the 5-minute rule. It seems to me this would be the better procedure and that under it we would be better off all around.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I may state that the intention is to complete general debate in 1 day, in one sitting.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER (after counting). One hundred and sixty-one Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 23]

Alshire	Goldsborough	Luckey, Nebr.	Shannon
Biermann	Goodwin	McGranery	Snell
Bland	Harlan	Magnuson	Starnes
Boykin	Healey	Meeks	Steagall
Buckley, N.Y.	Hennings	Mitchell, Ill.	Sweeney
Bulwinkle	Higgins	Mouton	Thomason, Tex.
Byrne	Holmes	Murdock, Utah	Thurston
Cannon, Wis.	Izac	Nichols	Tinkham
Connery	Kee	O'Connell, Mont.	Tolan
Creal	Keller	Parsons	Towey
Crowther	Kelly, N. Y.	Peterson, Fla.	Treadway
Culkin	Kerr	Quinn	Weaver
Disney	Kirwan	Reilly	Wene
Fitzgerald	Kleberg	Ryan	White, Idaho
Flannagan	Kniffin	Sabath	Wolcott
Ford, Calif.	Lambertson	Sadowski	Wood
Gasque	Lea	Schulte
Gearhart	Lesinski	Scott
Gilchrist	Luce	Scrugham

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and fifty-seven Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

On motion of Mr. RAYBURN, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleagues the gentlemen from California, Mr. TOLAN, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. GEARHART, due to the fact they are attending the funeral of Mr. Stubbs.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein a speech delivered over the radio last night by my colleague the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, and include therein a statement which Mr. Lorimer Rich made before a Senate committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a resolution adopted by the State Legislature of Louisiana in May 1936 protesting against the Federal land bank closing out the farmers. It is a very brief resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

(Mr. BUCK, Mr. KOPPLEMANN, and Mr. VOORHIS asked and were given permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD.)

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the first committee.

Mr. MEAD (when the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was called). Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I call up the bill (H. R. 2006) to permit certain special-delivery messengers to acquire a classified status through noncompetitive examination.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall not object if this bill could be amended so that it is perfectly clear the examination these people are to take is the same type of examination that is required for original appointees to these positions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair may say to the gentleman from New York that the amendment can be considered under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. TABER. I would rather the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole unless such an amendment is accepted.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the amendment to which the gentleman refers, so far as I am concerned, and I shall be very glad to have the gentleman offer it as soon as that point is reached in the proceedings.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes", approved March 3, 1885 (U. S. C., title 39, sec. 169), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Any messenger in the Special Delivery Service who has as much as 5 years' continuous service on the date of approval of this act may, upon the written recommendation of the postmaster at the office where such messenger is employed, if approved by the Post Office Department, be given a noncompetitive examination to qualify for the position of substitute clerk, carrier, or laborer, and having passed such examination he shall be retained in the Special Delivery Service until such time as there is or may be a vacancy in the substitute quota, when he will be placed at the foot of the substitute roll."

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to permit certain special-delivery messengers who have had 5 years or more of meritorious service to take a noncompetitive examination for appointment as substitute clerk, carrier, or laborer in the Postal Service. If a special-delivery messenger selected as the result of meritorious service should pass the examination required of him, he would go to the bottom of the substitute list and would be appointed when his name was reached on that list. In other words, he would not take precedence over anyone now on the substitute list.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. On the second page I note he is to be retained until there is a vacancy in the other position. In other words, he would not be immediately transferred to the foot of the substitute list, but would wait until such time as a vacancy appeared on that list?

Mr. MEAD. He would have to wait until there was a vacancy. The gentleman is correct. A vacancy could not be created for him, because there is legislation covering the appointment of substitutes. Only a certain number of them may be appointed in proportion to the number of regular employees in any given office; so that the gentleman is correct. He would remain a special-delivery messenger until a vacancy occurred, and then he would be placed at the bottom of the substitute roll.

Mr. DOWELL. In other words, there would be no place for him until a vacancy had occurred and the other substitute positions were all filled.

Mr. PEARSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. PEARSON. Is there any possibility that the passage of this measure would result in a man now in the Special Delivery being deprived of his position on account of failure to pass an examination of this character?

Mr. MEAD. No; it would not prevent a man now in the Special Delivery Service from remaining just where he is, regardless of the decision of the Civil Service Commission on his examination. His present position would be protected.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. After such messenger has been assigned to the substitute quota, may he continue to act after that as a special-delivery messenger?

Mr. MEAD. No; once he is appointed a substitute clerk, carrier, or laborer, he would report regularly for duty in that category and no longer serve as a special-delivery messenger.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Are not many of these substitutes now working only a matter of a few hours a week?

Mr. MEAD. That is not the case any longer. By the passage of the Quota Act we have prohibited postmasters from appointing more than a certain number of substitutes—1 substitute to every 8, 10, or 12 regulars. This gives the substitutes more work than was formerly the case; in fact, at times the postmasters have to employ temporaries to augment the force when the volume of mail is heavy and during the vacation periods.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It is the gentleman's opinion that during the time he is not called on for duty as a substitute he would not be eligible to act as a special messenger?

Mr. MEAD. He probably could be called upon under certain strained circumstances, but not as a rule.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to this bill, but I do not think it goes far enough.

I believe these special-delivery messengers ought to be placed under civil service. I have been told that the reason this was not considered by this committee was because they had no jurisdiction of such legislation, and that there is now pending in the Committee on the Civil Service the bill H. R. 2230, which will place them under civil service if the bill is passed.

I think this is a step in the right direction. There are many fine young men in this Delivery Service that ought to be promoted in the Service if they desire it; but I think the proper solution of the proposition is that we permit these men to be placed under civil service on a permanent basis. I am for the bill, although it does not go far enough to suit me, and I am not sure it goes far enough to suit the special-delivery messengers.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMNECK. Yes.

Mr. TOBEY. From the gentleman's knowledge of the civil service and how it works, if we place these men on the substitute rolls, would they not have to live more than threescore years and ten before they would ever get a job?

Mr. LAMNECK. In my city they might get a job in about 100 years, but not much before that.

Mr. TOBEY. In other words, this is just a noble gesture.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: Page 2, line 2, after the word "examination", insert "of the same character required for original appointment."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I have offered this amendment so it will be absolutely certain that the House means that when these people apply for an opportunity to go into the regular service, they will be given the same kind of examination they will have to take if they were applicants for original appointment.

I feel it is fair to let these people take a noncompetitive examination, but I feel we ought to go a little further in protecting the rights of the Civil Service.

I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the amendment read again.

The SEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again read the Taber amendment.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me this is unusual procedure. The bill now provides that an applicant may take a noncompetitive examination and, certainly, it would be the same kind of examination that was held originally. It seems to me to place such a provision as this in the bill would be a mistake because, if the Civil Service Commission holds the examination, it would have to be similar to the examination that would be taken by anyone who wanted this kind of job. It seems to me we should not clutter up the bill with an amendment like this and, for one, I am opposed to the adoption of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chair being in doubt, the House divided, and there were—ayes 40, noes 93.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

SALARIES OF RURAL LETTER CARRIERS

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I call up the bill (H. R. 3609) to protect the salaries of rural letter carriers who transfer from one route to another.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 3609, with Mr. Cox in the chair.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That effective as of July 1, 1934, subsection (d) of the first section of the act entitled "An act to adjust the salaries of rural letter carriers, and for other purposes", approved June 25, 1934, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof a new sentence to read as follows: "Should any such carrier be transferred to another route or other routes, the salary which he was receiving on June 30, 1934, shall be protected to the same extent as such salary would, under the preceding sentence, have been protected had such carrier continued to serve the route or routes from which he was transferred and had the length of such route or routes been changed to correspond to that of such other route or routes."

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I am very anxious that Members of the House understand the purpose of this legislation. To begin with, this legislation does not involve any added expenditure of public funds. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads enacted a bill reclassifying the salaries of rural carriers about 2 years ago, and as a result of that legislation we have saved five and a half million dollars in this service. These figures came to me from the Department just prior to the beginning of this session. In the administration of the act the Post Office Department contacted the Comptroller General's Office and asked if the "savings clause", which prevented the reduction of a rural letter carrier's salary in excess of $180, was to operate in favor of the carrier if transfers were made after the passage of that act. The Comptroller ruled that the "savings clause" no longer applied when a rural carrier was transferred from one route to another. Therefore when a carrier was transferred to a short, heavy route, with many boxes, adjacent to a large city, his salary would be reduced and his work increased as much as 2 or 3 hours a day.

As a result of that decision on the part of the Comptroller, which not only applies to actual transfers but also reduces the salary of a carrier if his route number is so much as changed—and that is effected very often because of numerous consolidations—the Department is protecting these men by not effecting these particular transfers, and it is also protecting them by not changing the numbers of the other routes.

The committee considered this bill very carefully. The Department was heard, and I have here the Postmaster General's report, in which he says:

The purpose of the bill H. R. 3609 is to amend subsection (d) of the first section of the act of June 25, 1934, fixing the salaries of rural carriers so as to restore to rural carriers who were entitled thereto the benefit of the savings clause of the salary act in case of transfer subsequent to July 1, 1934, from one route to another.

Under a ruling of the Comptroller General the saving clause no longer applied when a rural carrier was transferred from one route to another. A number of such transfers have been made in connection with the consolidations of routes, as well as on requests of carriers. The proposed amendment incorporated in bill H. R. 3609, if enacted into law, will restore the benefit of the saving clause to all carriers transferred to routes of substandard length, provided they were entitled to the benefit of the saving clause on July 1, 1934.

While this measure is believed to be in the interest of good administration insofar as it affords protection to rural carriers who were transferred for service reasons, it is not believed that rural carriers granted transfers to other routes for their own convenience should be given the protection proposed by this bill. Therefore, it is suggested that the bill be amended, line 8, page 1, by inserting after the word "transferred", the words "for the convenience of the Government", so as to deny the benefits of the bill to those carriers who are transferred for their own convenience.

That means that only those transfers ordered by the Government would be given the protection of this so-called savings clause. The committee, however, felt that as all transfers must be approved by the Government, it is not necessary to insert the words "for the convenience of the Government", and refused to adopt the amendment. The Department then closed by saying:

It has been ascertained from the Bureau of the Budget that this report is in accord with the program of the President.

In view of the explanation which I attempted to make, I trust that the bill will pass without amendment.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes.

Mr. TABER. If a rural carrier had a route which ran any distance and saw another route, and was receiving for carrying the first route $2,700 or $2,800, the other route being half the length, in an adjoining office that was vacant, and he requested transfer to it and was transferred, he could be transferred to that route in the other office for the same pay and not have his pay reduced at all?

Mr. MEAD. That is not so. Under the provisions of the original act we held that in the readjustment of the rural carriers' pay they could not be reduced in excess of $180.

That reduction applied to the routes then in existence. If a rural letter carrier is serving on a long route of 40 miles, he is receiving $1,800 per annum for the first 30 miles and $20 per annum for every mile in excess of 30 miles. If he transfers to a route 30 miles in length, 10 miles shorter than the route he formerly had, he will receive as his basic annual salary the basic salary paid for that route as stated in the Reclassification Act. In other words, he will receive $1,800 a year plus his equipment allowance. He will take a reduction, and that reduction is called for in existing law. But if a carrier on a 40-mile route, with 300 boxes, is transferred to a route of 20 miles, adjacent to a big city, with 800 boxes, and it takes him 8, 10, or 12 hours to deliver that mail, his pay will be reduced, but not in excess of $180 below what that route paid before the Reclassification Act went into effect. The bill does not protect the large salaries. It only protects those carriers who are transferred from one route to another from a reduction in excess of $180. That applies only to the pay called for under the law for that particular route to which he is transferred. The committee and the Department would certainly object, as would the Bureau of the Budget, if any such proposition as the gentleman has just presented to the House were contained in the bill. That is obvious.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. HOPE. Does the Department, under existing law, have the right to make such transfer arbitrarily, as the gentleman just described?

Mr. MEAD. The Department, under the law, can effect transfers in the interest of efficiency whenever opportunity arises, and they are doing that to the extent of some six or seven hundred a year through consolidations. That is the result of improved roads and the use of motor vehicles.

Mr. HOPE. In most cases, however, those transfers are to a longer route than to a shorter route, are they not?

Mr. MEAD. Oh, yes. Whenever opportunity presents, the Post Office Department will put two routes together and have them served by one carrier instead of two, effecting a saving in each consolidation of upward of $1,000 a year. That is the policy of the Department.

Mr. HOPE. But will the Department transfer him to a shorter route also, and a lower-paid route?

Mr. MEAD. There are so few of them in existence, and the consolidation program is eliminating them so rapidly, that I doubt very much whether the Department would transfer a carrier to a shorter route even if he requested it. I would say the policy is directly the opposite.

Mr. HOPE. Most cases which would be affected by this act are cases where transfer is requested by the carrier?

Mr. MEAD. No. I would say in most cases it is where the transfer was requested by the Department. For instance, suppose there was a short, heavy route adjacent to the city of Chicago, serving seven or eight hundred boxes, and it was 24 miles in length. Under the passage of the original Reclassification Act that carrier would have had his salary reduced, because he was only serving 24 miles, and it required 30 miles to secure the basic pay of $1,800. So he would be reduced from $1,800 to $1,440. But we felt it was an injustice to that carrier to pass a bill that would pay him for 24 miles at $60 a mile.

The reduction would be too great. So the committee inserted a "savings clause", applying to routes of less than 30 miles in length, whereby the reduction would not be in excess of $180. That provision means just this: That carrier who formerly received $1,800 a year would not be reduced to $1,440, but only to $1,620.

However, should that carrier's route number be changed, or should he transfer to another substandard route, the Comptroller holds that the carrier loses his rights to the "savings clause." Also, if a carrier transfers from a long to a short route, he loses the protection we meant to give on the short routes.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes.

Mr. BEITER. The gentleman has referred to consolidations made by the Department. Is it not a fact that most consolidations are made where the Department has practically no control? For instance, if train service is discontinued in a certain community, the Department then would be compelled either to have a star route take care of that particular locality or would be compelled to consolidate the offices affected in order to service the stations.

Mr. MEAD. In some cases that has been done.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. DOWELL. As I understand the gentleman's explanation, this bill will protect the salary of the carrier on the longer route when he is transferred to the shorter route.

Mr. MEAD. That is right.

Mr. DOWELL. To the extent of $1,800. May I ask the gentleman what the situation would be in the case of a carrier receiving more than that who is placed on a shorter route where he has much more work—and I know there are such shorter routes? Should he not receive the same compensation he was receiving on the old route from which he was transferred?

Mr. MEAD. No; probably not. The committee believes that a rural carrier serving a short route with a great many boxes should either be transferred to the mounted or city service, or that he should receive $10 per mile in excess of the regular mileage rate. Now, the regular mileage rate for the first 30 miles is $60 per mile. We believe that the carrier serving a short, heavy route adjacent to a large city ought to be given $70 a mile. Seldom do they have a route in excess of 30 miles, I may say to the members of the committee.

Mr. DOWELL. But he must supply his own equipment.

Mr. MEAD. He must supply his own equipment, and the Department allows him 5 cents a mile for all of the expenses that are listed as necessary equipment expenses, including his taxes, oil, gas, vehicle, and so forth.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Do I understand that this law protects the mail carrier who is getting a higher salary? Does it protect him, or does it protect the route?

Mr. MEAD. It protects the route.

Mr. REES of Kansas. That is, the new man comes on and takes the same salary the other man had when he went over to the shorter route; is that correct?

Mr. MEAD. This bill protects the route from the reduction that would have been effective under the original bill when it passed 2 years ago. It has nothing to do with the longer routes. It protects the routes that we meant to protect when we passed the original act, and they are the short routes adjacent to large cities.

Mr. REES of Kansas. But the increase comes about by reason of another man coming on the job, does it not?

Mr. MEAD. The increase comes about only when the carrier has his route lengthened or serves a greater mileage than was formerly the case.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. TABER. I wonder if the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from New York understood each other. I understood the gentleman from Kansas to ask the gentleman from New York if it protected the route. Now, this bill would not maintain the salary of a route after the carrier who had been transferred from it ceased to carry it.

Mr. MEAD. No. The explanation that I meant to give to the Committee was that if a man served a short, heavy route adjacent to a large city, the route being less than standard—which is 30 miles—but because of the numerous boxes his work required that he put in a long day, this bill and the original reclassification bill protect that route.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. DOWELL. Does this bill protect another carrier who is placed on this route? In other words, a carrier is transferred from a longer route to a shorter route; then, if there is a vacancy on the longer route and another carrier is placed on that route, will he go on at the same rate received by the carrier who was transferred?

Mr. MEAD. He will go on at the same rate paid on that route before he got there.

Mr. DOWELL. I did not quite understand it.

Mr. MEAD. He does not carry with him the pay he received on the longer route.

Mr. DOWELL. But this is a new carrier, another carrier.

Mr. MEAD. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Does this protect the carrier who is transferred?

Mr. MEAD. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. But if there is a vacancy on the shorter route and some other carrier is transferred to that route who has a longer route——

Mr. MEAD. He gets the same protection on that shorter route as the carrier ahead of him received.

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman means the one who was transferred from the longer route?

Mr. MEAD. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. That is what I want to get clear, and I believe I understand it. It seems to me when this salary is fixed for the person who is transferred from a longer route it ought to remain the same as any other carrier who carries that route.

Mr. MEAD. That is what this bill will do. We prevent a reduction applying on a route in excess of $180, and this carries it on.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Did I understand the gentleman to say under this revised law he had effected a saving of approximately five and a half million dollars?

Mr. MEAD. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. This change will not interfere in any way with that saving in the future?

Mr. MEAD. No. Here is the way we save the money. We used to pay the carriers $1,800 a year for 24 miles. The terms of the bill require the carrier to give us 6 miles free. In other words, he has to go 30 miles for $1,800. Under the old law we used to pay him $30 a mile for every mile in excess of 24 miles. Now we only pay him $20 a mile for every mile in excess of 30 miles. In that way we have saved five and a half million dollars. However, in the interpretation given by the Comptroller General we were almost cruel in our savings, as they applied to these short, heavy routes, and we want to obviate that by the passage of this bill.

Mr. BIERMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BIERMANN. If the carrier has been serving a 50-mile route and is transferred to a 30-mile route, what pay does he receive?

Mr. MEAD. Eighteen hundred dollars basic pay because he is serving 30 miles and a 30-mile route calls for the basic pay.

Mr. BIERMANN. If he is transferred to a 35-mile route, what will he receive?

Mr. MEAD. He would receive $1,800 plus $20 a mile for 5 additional miles.

Mr. BIERMANN. That is the condition now existing, is it not?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; that is the condition now existing.

Mr. BIERMANN. How does this bill change that situation?

Mr. MEAD. This bill only applies to the short routes which are less than 30 miles long.

Mr. BIERMANN. That is all this bill does?

Mr. MEAD. That is all.

Mr. BIERMANN. And the $1,620 is the minimum?

Mr. MEAD. On the short, heavy routes, 24 miles long.

Mr. BIERMANN. How heavy do they have to be to get this? There is nothing in the bill about that, is there?

Mr. MEAD. No; but that was brought before us when we studied the bill.

Mr. BIERMANN. Is that determined by the number of boxes or the amount of mail?

Mr. MEAD. It is determined by the number of boxes. This bill simply obviates the Comptroller's decision that bore heavily upon those carriers in that particular category.

Mr. BIERMANN. How about these 4-month routes, from December to March?

Mr. MEAD. The bill has nothing to do with those. It simply requires that the carrier deliver mail 6 days a week or every other day at least.

Mr. BIERMANN. The year round?

Mr. MEAD. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. I am sorry to detain the gentleman, but I do not get clear the answer the gentleman gave a while ago with reference to the shorter routes where the carrier was transferred from a longer route. Under this bill, as I read it, should such carrier be transferred from a longer route or another route, this applies to that carrier only. Does it apply to another carrier who may afterward be transferred to this route? Is that correct?

Mr. MEAD. No. It will apply to the carrier who is transferred to that route now and it will apply to a carrier who is transferred to that route tomorrow. Here is an explanation of the bill that might clear it up. The Salary Reclassification Act of 1934 contained a savings clause whereby a rural carrier serving a 6-days-a-week route of less than 30 miles or a 3-days-a-week route of less than 60 miles could not be reduced in salary by more than $180 per annum.

In other words, we realized we were reducing the salary of rural letter carriers when we passed that act, but we wanted to stop the reduction at $180. The act sets up salaries of $1,800 for a route of 30 miles, $60 per mile per annum on routes of less than 30 miles, and $1,800 plus $20 a mile per annum for each mile in excess of 30 miles on longer routes. The equipment-maintenance allowance was increased to 5 cents a mile. The "savings clause" applied only to the carriers in the Service at the time the act went into effect on July 1, 1934. The Comptroller General has ruled that the "savings clause" does not apply to a carrier whose assignment has been changed, even though it is only a change in the route number; and in order to protect the carrier we have to pass this bill. The Department suggests we limit the legislation to carriers who are transferred at the Government's convenience. We say in the bill it should apply to all carriers transferred by order of the Government.

Mr. DOWELL. That, to my mind, is very clear; but the question I am interested in is what becomes of the other carrier who happens to follow the carrier who is transferred from a longer route? Does he get the same pay as the one who was transferred from the longer route and who has vacated that route? In other words, if a carrier is transferred to a shorter route from a longer one, he is protected.

Mr. MEAD. He is protected, and so is the man who follows him.

Mr. DOWELL. Suppose he resigns after he is transferred and someone else takes it, either by examination or by transfer, from a shorter route, does he take it on the same pay?

Mr. MEAD. He takes it on the same pay as the carrier ahead of him received.

Mr. DOWELL. The bill states "should any such carrier be transferred", and so forth, referring to the specific carrier.

Mr. MEAD. We are informed that the bill will protect the carrier the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. DOWELL. I am pleased to have the gentleman's construction.

Mr. MEAD. We are trying to make it continuous on that route. This bill has satisfied the carriers and the Department.

Mr. DOWELL. That is what we want done.

Mr. MEAD. I think the bill covers that matter.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. The thing that strikes me as the injustice is that the man on the shorter route will put in 10 to 12 more hours of work per week and yet get his pay cut.

Mr. MEAD. That is true, but we have a bill which will permit the Department to increase the rate on these short, heavy routes $10 in excess of the basic rate paid on the longer route.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. You are going to take care of them?

Mr. MEAD. That will be taken care of in another bill.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. All right.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does any member of the committee desire recognition in opposition to the bill?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard.

Mr. Chairman, I can see no possible excuse for passing this bill and permitting the carrier to apply for transfer to a shorter route and protect his salary at a rate which would be fixed at a higher rate than any other carrier would receive on that route.

It does not seem to me that this is the way to do things, and I think unless the Committee limits this bill to cases where a carrier is transferred without his request, and for the convenience of the Government, the bill ought not to receive favorable consideration. Frankly, it is not a big bill, because I do not imagine there are a tremendous lot of these transfers, but I can see where this kind of transfer would be readily and easily abused, and I hope that the House, in passing this legislation, will adopt the safeguards which the Department has requested.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That effective as of July 1, 1934, subsection (d) of the first section of the act entitled "An act to adjust the salaries of rural letter carriers, and for other purposes", approved June 25, 1934, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof a new sentence to read as follows: "Should any such carrier be transferred to another route or other routes, the salary which he was receiving on June 30, 1934, shall be protected to the same extent as such salary would, under the preceding sentence, have been protected had such carrier continued to serve the route or routes from which he was transferred and had the length of such route or routes been changed to correspond to that of such other route or routes."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: Page 2, line 2, after the word "routes", insert "but such promotion shall apply only when such transfer shall be made for the convenience of the Government."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, this simply provides the safeguard that the Department itself asked for when the bill was submitted to it, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The committee considered this matter very carefully, and, as I stated before, in view of the fact that all these changes in route numbers, consolidations, and transfers are made with the approval of the Department, I do not believe the word "convenience" properly belongs in the bill. In view of the fact the Department has complete control of the situation now, the amendment offered by my colleague from New York is superfluous, and I therefore trust the Committee will reject the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Cox, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3609) to protect the salaries of rural letter carriers who transfer from one rural route to another, had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SALARIES OF LETTER CARRIERS IN VILLAGE DELIVERY SERVICE

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I call up the bill (H. R. 4285) to increase the salaries of letter carriers in the village delivery service.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up a bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 10 of the act entitled "An act reclassifying the salaries of postmasters and employees of the Postal Service, readjusting their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis, increasing postal rates to provide for such readjustment, and for other purposes", approved February 28, 1925 (U. S. C., title 39, sec. 106), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 10. Carriers in the village delivery service shall be graded with salaries for each grade, as follows: First grade, $1,300; second grade, $1,400; third grade, $1,500. That in the readjustment of salaries of letter carriers in the village delivery service to conform to the grades herein provided, village carriers who have served as such for 2 years or more shall be placed in grade 3; village carriers who have served for 1 but less than 2 years shall be placed in grade 2; and village carriers when they receive their regular appointments shall be placed in grade 1. In determining the aggregate period of service upon which promotions are to be based, all time served as a letter carrier in the village delivery service is to be included: Provided, That hereafter substitute carriers in the village delivery service when appointed regular carriers in the village delivery service shall have credit for actual time served on a basis of 1 year for each 254 days of 8 hours served as a substitute, and appointed to the grade to which such carrier would have progressed had his original appointment as substitute been to grade 1. Any fractional part of a year's service shall be included within his service as a regular employee in determining eligibility for promotion to the next higher grade following appointment to a regular position: Provided further, That letter carriers in the village delivery service shall be promoted successively after 1 year's satisfactory service in each grade to the next higher grade until they reach the third grade. All promotions shall be made at the beginning of the quarter following 1 year's satisfactory service in the grade. The pay of substitute letter carriers in the village delivery service shall be at the rate of 55 cents per hour."

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect on July 1, 1937.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, this bill is a simple one and aims to increase the salaries of our village carriers $150 in each of the three grades. Their present salary range is from $1,150 to $1,350 a year. Under the bill the salaries are $1,300 in the first grade, $1,400 in the second grade, and $1,500 in the third grade. The top grade will pay $150 more than the present top grade pays.

There are 953 village carriers and this bill will cost approximately $186,150 a year.

These carriers deliver in cities and villages where the postal receipts are in excess of $5,000 per annum and where the population is in excess of 1,500. In looking over the record we find that there are a great many village carriers serving in communities where the population is greater than in other communities that enjoy City Delivery Service. In other words, there are communities in the United States where letter carriers are receiving only $1,350 a year which are larger than communities where letter carriers are receiving $2,100 a year.

I have before me a list of communities that sets forth the discrimination existing in this connection. For example, in the city of Alexander, Ala., with a population of 4,515, the letter carriers are paid from $1,150 to $1,350 a year, while in Brewster, Ala., with a population of 2,800, the letter carriers receive $2,100 a year. In Magnolia, Ark., with a population of 3,000, the letter carriers receive from $1,150 to $1,350 a year, while in Bentonville, Ark., with a population of 2,200, the letter carriers receive $2,100 a year.

We aim to give this low-paid group consideration which was not given to them when the last salary bill was enacted, and which graded all other salaries in this particular service. In view of the fact that everybody admits it is almost impossible to live on this niggardly salary in the cities of the United States, and that this request coming from our committee is modest and moderate, I hope there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The gentleman has pointed out the discrepancy, which amounts to a discrimination, as I view it, as between men in the Government Postal Service performing similar service. Even with the passage of this bill and with the increase that you are granting these village letter carriers, there is still going to remain a difference of some $700 or $800 per annum in the salaries of many men performing the same service. Is there not some way that the committee can bring in a bill which will correct this discrimination? In other words, in this measure we are granting a small increase to only some village carriers, whereas that discrepancy will continue to exist, and can it not be remedied?

Mr. MEAD. I doubt very much whether it can be remedied. We have taken into consideration the attitude of the Department and the Budget Bureau, and I believe the committee is doing the best it can. A bill on this subject was rejected in the other House a year ago because it contained a larger salary, and, therefore, I think this is the best we can get through.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

RENEWAL OF STAR-ROUTE CONTRACTS

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads I call up the bill (H. R. 4408) to provide for the renewal of star-route contracts at 4-year intervals, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up the bill H. R. 4408, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4408, with Mr. Cox in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, this bill affects the Star Route Service. Star routes serve post offices and carry mail at great distance from one post office to another. At times the carriers serve individual boxes, but that service is generally left to the rural carrier and comes properly within the domain of the Rural Service.

Star-route contracts are let by competitive bidding. The United States is divided into four star-route districts, and every year bids are called for in one of those four districts. The contract is usually awarded to the lowest bidder. All that it is necessary for him to do in order to qualify as to responsibility is to secure the approval of some postmaster in his area. Men have been appointed to the Star Route Service who have not been of the proper type. We attempt to restrict it a little by the passage of this bill.

It has been brought to our attention that certain star-route carriers who have served the Department well for many years were taken out of service because in competitive bidding someone else underbid them sometimes to the extent of only $5 or $10.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I gladly yield to the gentleman.

Mr. EATON. I have had a number of complaints from star-route carriers that when these bids are called for, the contract price of the present carrier is announced in the public invitation for bids, which makes it necessary for the carrier to bid against himself. In other words, if he gets the job he has to bid less this year than he received last year. Does this bill take care of that?

Mr. MEAD. No; it does not.

Mr. EATON. Why not?

Mr. MEAD. Because it is the opinion of the committee and of the Department that as much information as possible should be given to prospective bidders. The carrier on a given star route knows all about the cost of equipment and operation. He also knows the amount of money he is receiving. It was held by the committee that every other good citizen of the United States who desires to bid on a given route should have the same information. But we do believe that where the best interests of the Government are protected, where competitive bids are approximately the same, the experienced star-route carrier should be given consideration by the Department.

Mr. EATON. If the gentleman will allow me to make further reference to it——

Mr. MEAD. Certainly.

Mr. EATON. A man who holds office knows all the costs, and how much he has made or lost during his contract. Someone else desires to get the contract. He only knows the price which the holder of the job has received. Of course, he thinks he can get by, and consequently he bids just a little below what the other gentleman has been receiving. That puts that gentleman under the necessity of underbidding himself, which seems to me an unfair thing.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. MASON. Does not this bill protect the present star-route man in the renewal of his contract to the extent of allowing the Department to use its discretion in considering these bids if they are anywhere near alike?

Mr. MEAD. That is right. This bill gives the present carrier more protection than he has enjoyed before.

I have in mind a star-route carrier who had a district in the Finger Lakes area of western New York. He had served his people well for some 38 or 39 years. He was not entitled to retirement, because retirement does not cover competitive service. He was underbid by someone who knew nothing about the nature and character of the route. The lowest bid was only about $10 lower than the bid of the veteran, yet the Comptroller General held that the veteran must be deprived of his route and that the contract should be awarded to the one who would effect a saving of $10 to the Government.

Mr. EATON. This bill obviates that situation, does it?

Mr. MEAD. Yes. It gives that veteran some protection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. As I understand it, the men now in the Service are for this bill; are they not?

Mr. MEAD. Oh, yes.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. FULLER. Is the bill so worded that it would repeal that section of the law where the Department holds that the contract must be let, irrespective of the responsibility of the party who makes the bid, to the lowest bidder, and that the bond he gives settles the question of responsibility?

Mr. MEAD. The bill will, to an extent, repeal that provision.

Mr. FULLER. If the bill does not repeal it, there will be no discretion?

Mr. MEAD. When the best interest of the Government is protected, then the Department may award the contract to the person who is not the lowest bidder.

Mr. FULLER. It does provide that, does it?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; that is right; the Department may renew the old contract instead of giving the route to a new bidder.

Now, I want to obviate questions by explaining very briefly the provisions of the bill.

The bill provides for the renewal of star-route contracts for succeeding terms of 4 years each, and permits the Department to allow extra pay to carriers where the route mileage is increased by detours or where increased mail volume or a change in schedule necessitates larger equipment. On the other hand, where a change permits the operation of the route with reduced equipment the pay may be reduced or the route readvertised. It works both ways. Such increases or reductions in pay must be in proportion to the contract rate, so that no favoritism can be displayed.

Another paragraph permits the Department to readvertise the route when changes in schedules are made which increase or decrease the time the contractor will be away from the initial terminal, when such changes are not satisfactory to the contractor. The contractor and the Department both will have something to say in such cases.

On page 4 we have a revision of existing law with regard to bonds to conform with the renewal feature contained in the bill; in other words, we must insert "renewal of contracts" in the law, so that a new bond will be required whenever a contract is renewed. As at present, bonds exceeding $5,000 must be approved by a postmaster of the first, second, or third class.

The next section of the bill relates to temporary service and permits retroactive payment. Your question is answered only in that provision which permits a renewal of an existing contract when it is in the interest of good government.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. Suppose road conditions are such that it becomes necessary to loop a route——

Mr. MEAD. The gentleman means to change its mileage substantially?

Mr. KNUTSON. To loop the route; for instance, let us say a route is 60 miles long, as frequently is the case. Knowing the condition of the roads, one carrier may cover only 35 miles, having a substitute take the mail from a certain point and finish the route. Can that be done under this bill?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; that can be done; and if there is a substantial difference in the work done by the carrier, he brings it to the attention of the postmaster and the Department; but only coincident with the issuing of the order of approval will he be given increased compensation. It may take the Department 10, 20, or 30 days to make its decision, but he will be paid for his extra work only from the day the Department issues the order.

Mr. KNUTSON. Then his rights are protected?

Mr. MEAD. His rights are protected.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes.

Mr. BIERMANN. Has the committee ever considered a proposal to put these star routes on a definite pay basis like the rural carriers?

Mr. MEAD. I may say that the committee held hearings and discussed that matter for some time, but decided this was the best bill that could be passed at this time. Yes; we have considered that subject.

Mr. BIERMANN. Is that likely to occur in the near future?

Mr. MEAD. I cannot say. The committee is considering that matter, and in the last session we asked the Department to create a committee to make a study for us. This investigation has been completed and the report is available. The Department's committee reported against the suggestion the gentleman has just made, but favored the provisions contained in this bill.

Mr. BIERMANN. But has it not been a fact that men have bid on these star routes who did not know the cost of keeping up their equipment, and the like; and bid actually less than it was worth to do the work?

Mr. MEAD. That occurs in many cases.

Mr. BIERMANN. How much does this bill correct that situation?

Mr. MEAD. This bill does not correct it very much except to the extent that any changes in the operation of the contract may be compensated for by the Department—any changes as a result of a tearing up of a road, a bridge, a ferry—any detour. In such cases the star-route carrier may make application to the Department for additional compensation. In addition to that, if the service of a contractor is satisfactory, the Department may continue the veteran carrier's contract rather than make a change and give the route to a lower bidder.

Mr. BIERMANN. I have not had an opportunity to read this bill, but does it provide how much that variation can be?

Mr. MEAD. The gentleman means a variation in salary? Oh, no; this bill prescribes that it must be in the interest of good government.

Mr. BIERMANN. Is it limited to $100 a year?

Mr. MEAD. I assume the Comptroller General will have something to say about that, but it is in the interest of efficient operation of the service.

Mr. BIERMANN. Would the chairman accept an amendment to correct this situation?

Mr. MEAD. I doubt very much whether the Department would agree to such an amendment, but I may say to the gentleman from Iowa that we are considering further legislation on this subject.

Mr. BIERMANN. We do not have to be governed by what the Department wants; we are legislating; they are enforcing.

Mr. MEAD. They are enforcing and administering, but the committee members are, in effect, the board of directors, and they, in harmony with the Department, have approved this bill. As the spokesman of the committee, I must defend the measure as it is. I may say to the gentleman that any amendment that would arbitrarily set a figure probably in excess of what some of the members of the committee may have in mind could not be accepted by me at this time.

Mr. BIERMANN. Would the gentleman be unfavorable to an amendment to fix these salaries at something like what the job is worth?

Mr. MEAD. I may say to the distinguished gentleman from Iowa that I favor legislation at the earliest possible date fixing in a scientific way, by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Post Office Department, or by legislation, the salaries for this service. I think the time is coming when that can be accomplished.

Mr. BIERMANN. I hope so.

Mr. LUDLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LUDLOW. I have not heard all of the illuminating statements which the gentleman has made. In times past we have had a great deal of difficulty occasioned by star-route bidders underbidding, and very appreciable injury has resulted to them because they did not take into consideration all the factors of the service. I wonder if the gentleman's bill reaches that situation in any way?

Mr. MEAD. No; except for the fact that under certain circumstances we permit renewal of contracts, but only in the interest of the Government do we approach the suggestion the gentleman makes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am glad to see that the committee reports a bill with reference to these star routes, because I think the present law is somewhat antiquated. I know in many instances bids have been made which have been grossly inadequate and it has been difficult for the bidder to carry out the work. I think there is one provision of the bill that may be helpful in that regard. I note in section 5 there is provision that proposals for carrying the mail on star routes shall not be considered unless the bidder is a legal resident of the county or counties traversed by the route over which the mails are to be carried. I think that is a wise provision. I know in Texas, which is a very large State, sometimes a bidder will live in a remote section of the State and will offer a bid for some route that is so far removed he does not know anything about the local conditions of the route. He has never been over the route. As a result the Government will secure a very low bid, and when the bidder finds out what route he has to traverse, he cannot carry out his contract.

I think the section to which I have referred will have a tendency to eliminate some of these bids that have been too low, resulting in the bidders not being able to perform the contract. I want to congratulate the committee on having that provision inserted in there.

Mr. MEAD. The committee made every effort to eliminate the most serious of the complaints which have been brought to the attention of the Department in the past. We have gone into the matter deeply, and have tried to make the Service a little more permanent and to improve it at the same time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Of course that will take some time.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. May I ask the gentleman whether or not the bill affects a situation that is rather prevalent up my way. That is, where bus companies take on the Star Route Service as a sort of an incident to their regular business, and are therefore enabled to bid at a lower rate than an independent individual.

Mr. MEAD. No; the bill will not prevent bus and truck companies from carrying the mail. We found that a great many railroad trains have been withdrawn, which slows up the mail, but, where a passenger train has been withdrawn, bus service has been substituted. Therefore, to keep up the mobility of this service and its efficiency, the Department authorizes the carrying of the mail over the new route established by the bus company.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. That is where there is no railroad service?

Mr. MEAD. That is right.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. With further reference to the query of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] when bids are made below the cost of carrying the mail, and changes necessarily have to take place and the Government has to step in, is there an expense to the Government when such occurrences happen?

Mr. MEAD. The Government is protected by a surety bond, and it is usually the surety that loses.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. But does the Government entail any loss?

Mr. MEAD. The Government's loss is minor. There is the red tape necessary to make an investigation, dispatching an inspector to make an investigation, readvertising for bids, and so forth.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Will this bill put an end to such occurrences?

Mr. MEAD. This bill will only affect glaring cases where the bid is obviously far too low to permit good service to be rendered.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. It is helpful in that direction?

Mr. MEAD. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will it be the policy to continue accepting bids and have the Postmaster General use his discretion as to whether or not the old contract shall be renewed, or will the acceptance of bids be discontinued?

Mr. MEAD. No. That matter was discussed at the hearings, and it was assumed that the practice now in operation would be the practice in the future, except that where the best interests of the Government would be served thereby the contract will be renewed at the same rate of pay prevailing at the end of the contract term.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In accepting the bid you get a check on the other side?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; and they can decide on what kind of service may be excepted and what difference or savings might be brought about.

Mr. BEITER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BEITER. I do not like the system now employed by the Department in awarding contracts to the lowest bidder. I think there should be a system similar to the one which establishes a basic rate for the rural letter carrier or the letter carrier in the cities. A fair rate of pay could be established. Why cannot the same system be worked out whereby a star-route carrier could be given a fair and decent rate of pay rather than being compelled to bid and perhaps bid too low and get into competitive bidding where they have to bid too low, particularly in the time of a depression?

Mr. MEAD. I may say to the gentleman there are several bills pending before our committee which have that object.

Mr. BEITER. I think the gentleman has a good bill here and I am going to support it.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOPE. Has the committee considered reclassifying star routes according to the character of the service that is rendered by the carrier? In a great many of these routes the service performed is essentially the same as that performed by a rural carrier. In others they simply carry the mail from one post office to another.

It seems to me there is an essential difference in the character of the service which ought to be reflected in the compensation which is paid, and I wondered if the committee had given any consideration to making such a classification as that.

Mr. MEAD. I may say to the gentleman that the committee has considered the proposition of putting on motor-trucks that would operate out of the large cities and cover a great many small post offices. There would be not only an operator to run the truck but a post-office clerk to sort the mail. They would take on and dispatch mail at every office served en route. This is the system they now have in Germany, and it tends to expedite delivery of the mail. It would take the place of the service we are losing as a result of the withdrawal of trains on our railroads.

Within the last 4 or 5 years we have lost thousands of trains that used to render service between towns. For example, mail would be taken on at a given town; it would be immediately sorted and dispatched, beginning with the next town. Under the Star Route Service the carrier may begin in the morning, say, at 7 o'clock, and drive a hundred miles along a given route, collecting mail from every post office and unloading it all in the office at the far end of his route, where it would not be sorted until the next day. He would leave early the next morning and gather mail all the way back to the other end of his route, and this mail would not be sorted until the following day. The mail in this way would be delayed to a great degree along that route, due to the fact that there was no classifying or distributing en route, because this was done only at the offices at the termini of the star route.

Mr. HOPE. If that were done, these men would have to be in the Government service, would they not?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; they would have to be in the Government service. To be more specific in answering the gentleman's question, we realize that there are seven or eight different classes of star-route service. There is the star-route carrier who delivers only to post offices. There is another star-route carrier who delivers to post offices and to rural boxes. There is another star-route carrier who maintains an express service, and another who maintains a trucking business, as well as another who maintains both an express and a trucking business and takes on the mail as a side line. There are seven or eight different classes of service, and, because the system is so complicated, this is the best bill we could bring out at this time. However, we expect to continue our study of the subject and hope some day to present to the House an important measure along this line.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. STEFAN. That does not mean that eventually the star routes will be eliminated?

Mr. MEAD. No; they might not be eliminated. They might be classified or have their pay set for them by the Department or some other agency.

Mr. STEFAN. The bill we have under consideration is merely to improve this Service and it does not carry any appropriation or have anything to do with the bidding?

Mr. MEAD. It will effect some losses and some savings, and the contracts will continue.

Mr. STEFAN. I may say to my colleagues that I have a number of these star-route carriers in my district. They have studied the proposed legislation and they are very much interested in its passage because they believe it will improve the Service. There is nothing at all changed by this bill.

Mr. MEAD. Nothing whatever. It eliminates some of the cruelties incident to the operation under existing law.

Mr. STEFAN. I agree with my colleague, and I am very happy to hear my colleague say the Department is in favor of this kind of legislation.

Mr. MEAD. They will look with favor upon this measure, although I doubt whether they would favor some of the measures that have been suggested this afternoon.

Mr. STEFAN. I am sure my colleague will agree that these star-route carriers have been performing a very valuable service.

Mr. MEAD. A very valuable service, and a very large one, too.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. TERRY. Under the proposed bill the Post Office Department is protected because, as I understand it, this is entirely within the discretion of the Postmaster General as to whether he shall provide for these 4-year periods.

Mr. MEAD. No; the contracts will run for 4 years, just as is the case now, and if a contract is renewed it will be for 4 years, so that the expiration of the contract will take place coincident with the expiration of every other contract in that section.

Mr. TERRY. But if the Post Office Department is not satisfied with the bid at the end of the current 4-year period, they can advertise for new bids?

Mr. MEAD. That is right; and I may say that our committee accepted the amendments offered by the Department.

Mr. TERRY. Let me ask the gentleman this question: If the Post Office Department puts more boxes on a star route than the route had before, then the star-route carrier would be compensated for the additional work?

Mr. MEAD. If the carrier has to provide increased equipment to handle the increased mail.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. FULLER. I think the bill is a step in the right direction and has very much merit; but I think we should not be led astray by thinking that the law is amended to any extent.

Mr. MEAD. That is right. The law provides that the contract must be let to the lowest bidder, and the contract must be let under the bill in the same way; but there is some discretion given to the Department in allowing them to renew contracts. And unless the Department understands that it is the intent of the Congress in passing this law for them to use some real discretion and protect the carriers against irresponsible bidders, they are liable to hold to the letter of the old law, as it is not repealed, and proceed as they are doing now.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to see this bill passed in its present form because, as the gentleman said, we are moving in the right direction, and I am afraid if we adopt any restrictive or more definite amendments we may not be successful in securing its final passage.

Mr. FULLER. I am very much interested. I feel there could be a more liberal bill drawn, but evidently this committee has studied it closely and knows more about it than a Member would ordinarily, and no doubt has taken the matter up with the Department; and in view of that fact, and this being an opening wedge, I am in favor of the bill as it stands.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes.

Mr. PIERCE. Do I understand that they have some leeway in renewing these contracts?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; when it is in the best interest of the Postal Service.

Mr. PIERCE. That is the point that I am anxious about.

Mr. MEAD. When the renewal could be justified under existing law by the Comptroller General.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I am interested in this because in my particular section of the country we have star-route carriers who are performing some express service as well as mail service. Under the economic conditions that we have, in view of the drought and all those things, these contracts have been bid down to a point where they endanger the welfare of the service. I am interested in the gentleman's statement that some of the cruelties are to be eliminated. Will this have a tendency to freeze these low-priced contracts at the present price?

Mr. MEAD. It will have no tendency to freeze them. When they have been made too low they need not be renewed, because the surety, with a contract on which he is losing money, would not accept renewal. Therefore, bids will be advertised for in that community. This only applies where a star-route carrier's service in the past has been eminently satisfactory and he is willing to renew his contract at the same rate of pay. In that case renewal might be considered if it would be in the Government's interest.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Of course, the gentleman realizes that in many cases the surety of a certain check has led many people to bid for those contracts at prices absolutely below a fair wage.

Mr. MEAD. Where a bid is made, and it is from some responsible bidder, and it is lower perhaps than good service would permit, I assume in such cases the Department will not accept the low bidder. There would have to be evidence of no great saving.

I am glad to have the Members of the House showing such interest in this particular Service, and I am glad to hear them express their faith and confidence in the loyalty of this Service. I only regret that the committee has not presented a bill more in keeping with the liberal spirit of the Members who have taken the floor.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes.

Mr. CARLSON. To bring out the fact that in the general discussion before the whole committee and in the hearings before the subcommittee, the star-route carriers appeared and felt that this was all that we could get and that this legislation is satisfactory to them.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes.

Mr. PACE. I notice the gentleman very properly provides in the bill for increased pay where there is an unusual extension of route due to construction of a bridge or the closing of a ferry.

Mr. MEAD. That is right.

Mr. PACE. The gentleman will probably agree that we are building more bridges than we are destroying now, and does he not think the bill should provide for a reduction in pay where there has been a material reduction in the length of the route by reason of the construction of a bridge or other conditions?

Mr. MEAD. That is the present practice of the Department, and that is permitted by the provisions of this law.

Mr. PACE. Might I interrupt the gentleman? Is it not permitted only where it involves a reduction in equipment and a reduction in route?

Mr. MEAD. No; the information presented to our committee is that wherever there is a reduction in mileage and a substantial reduction in the volume of work, or a reduction resulting from changed road conditions, the Department may reduce the pay of the contractor proportionately or may readvertise for bids.

Mr. PACE. May I read to the gentleman from page 3 of the bill?

Mr. MEAD. I am quoting not only the provisions of this bill but existing law and the practice of the Department on this subject.

Mr. PACE. Would not any existing law be changed by this provision that the pay may be reduced where the schedule is so changed as to permit its maintenance with a reduction in units of equipment and drivers? Would not that change existing law?

Mr. MEAD. We accepted the amendment presented to us by the Department on that subject, and they are evidently satisfied with those amendments.

They work in the interest of the Department as well as in the interest of the carrier. I am afraid that any further amendment might disturb the provisions of this bill, or the provisions in an existing statute or regulation of the Department. The Department favors the language of the bill on that subject. The committee accepted this phraseology. So I would like to see the bill stand or fall as it is written, although I can see much merit in the suggestion offered by the gentleman.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question that is not quite germane to the matter under consideration?

Mr. MEAD. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. WEARIN. By virtue of the fact that we are discussing mail routes, I should like to know if the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads knows whether or not the Department is going to exhibit a little more friendly attitude toward the extension of existing rural routes and improve the service to farmers who are not now served by rural routes?

Mr. MEAD. I suggest that the gentleman from Iowa discuss that matter with the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEARIN. I appreciate the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. MEAD. I am sure that both the gentleman and the Department will do the very best they can under the appropriation. [Laughter.]

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. Can the gentleman give us any estimate of how much has actually been saved by the curtailment of service in the rural routes and star routes, and the cutting off of small post offices? I have lost 25 post offices in my district.

Mr. MEAD. I could not tell the gentleman how much money has been saved.

Mr. PIERCE. I was wondering how much they had actually saved out of this.

Mr. MEAD. We have reduced the personnel of the rural service by approximately 10,000 in the past 10 or 12 years. At the same time we have lopped off that many fourth-class postmasters. Of course, we saved all those salaries, and reduced the salaries of the present rural letter carriers, so that we have effected great savings. Every time a route is consolidated and a rural carrier is eliminated, the Department saves $1,100 and at the same time gives additional service.

Mr. PIERCE. I want to say further that I have found a much better attitude in the Post Office Department lately than I found 3 years ago. They are much more amenable now.

Mr. MEAD. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. Inasmuch as I intend to vote for this bill, I would like to ask the gentleman if he will not yield me 5 minutes?

Mr. MEAD. I will be glad to yield the gentleman 5 minutes a little later.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. When the gentleman from New York told about reducing fourth-class post offices and rural carriers, he was not telling me anything. [Laughter.]

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this bill as a matter of hoped-for efficiency, but I am a little concerned about the effect of a portion of it. When our third-class postmasters' term expired they were told they did not need to take examinations and were eligible for the positions. That examinations would be held for other candidates who cared to take them, but present encumbents would be eligible if, in the discretion of the Postmaster General and for the good of the service, it were felt that they should be reappointed. I am simply serving notice that, in supporting this bill, I shall expect that, in the discretion of the Postmaster General and for the good of the service, Democratic Senators and Democratic Congressmen will not be the only ones to be consulted as to whether or not the good of the service requires that present carriers be considered regardless of what their political affiliations may be. You may not think that is serious, but I believe we should mention it at this time. We are of the opinion that political pressure could be so used knowing that, whether Republicans or Democrats are in control, the Postmaster General's Department is generally regarded as a political hotbed in these matters. I thoroughly believe, however, in this attempt at efficiency. We have had troubles enough in connection with these contracts. I notice the great interest you all have in this bill.

I think the bids heretofore submitted to the Government by the present contractors are generally very inadequate. Yet today, after a man has fully equipped himself for this service and has rendered good service, there are many ready to underbid him and the postmaster is rarely able to refuse his endorsement. They must recommend the applicant if he is a citizen of good reputation.

If he can find bondsmen, the lowest bidder must receive the contract, even if there is doubt as to the adequacy of his equipment or the service he will render. I doubt very much if an answer relating to the Comptroller General has been sufficiently supplied to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Arkansas. I can foresee a little trouble with the Comptroller General in connection with these matters. He has ruled heretofore that when you secure a bondsman to guarantee fulfillment of contracts, the Government must insist on complete fulfillment. The contractor failing, the bondsman has to go through with it. I doubt very much if this bill will, as it is drawn, overcome the power of the Comptroller General in this respect. We do not wish to have our school children carried in a bus operated by an irresponsible bidder. We do not customarily allow such a one to displace a man who has rendered good service and who has good equipment and who has submitted a reasonable bid for the renewal of the service. We should perhaps adopt the same policy in this matter. We have suffered greatly because of low bidders, who attempt to curtail the service and save money in order to carry on under an inadequate contract.

I have certain compunctions about voting for this bill. There will be frozen into this service those who have bid too low heretofore, who frequently did not really reside in the section to be served, although they may later have taken up such residence for that particular purpose. In many cases these recent contractors should not be frozen in and more worthy citizens should be given a chance to compete.

Again I say, we shall be watchful as to the discretion of the Postmaster General and his selections "for the good of the Service." Our former third-class postmasters have had good cause to be rather suspicious of such discretion.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. TABER. Is it not a fact that the Post Office Department has objected to subsection (a) of section 1 of the bill relating to the extensions?

Mr. MEAD. The Postmaster General made some objections. His report reads in part as follows:

It has been ascertained from the Bureau of the Budget that the foregoing suggestions for amendments to H. R. 4408 would be in accord with the program of the President. However, subsection (a) of section 1 of the bill, relating to the renewal of star-route contracts at 4-year intervals is stated to be not in accord with the program of the President.

The Department requested that subsection (a) of section 1 be stricken out, but in the judgment of the committee that is the meat, the heart, and the center of the bill.

We accepted all of the amendments suggested by the Department, but we felt we ought to keep that provision in, because it was the aim of the committee to make the service more permanent and to improve its efficiency.

Mr. TABER. What would be the procedure in the letting of contracts in the future? Would advertisements be called for, or would the renewal of the contract be put through?

Mr. MEAD. The Department could renew the contract at the price then in existence, with or without bids. The contract could be renewed, and I presume this may be the custom after bids are made known and the contract rate to a carrier whose service has been satisfactory is compared with new bids from those whose service is an unknown quantity. For example, if a carrier had been serving a route for 10 years or more and the bid of his nearest competitor was only a little lower, I believe the Postmaster General would recommend that the contract be renewed. I presume this will be the policy of the Department, because they are prompted to renew contracts.

Mr. TABER. But there would be nothing to require the Department to ask for bids; they could ask for bids in one case and not ask for them in the next case.

Mr. MEAD. But in all cases it would have to be in the best interests of the Government. They would have to determine that it would be in the best interests of the Postal Service. A postal inspector would no doubt be sent out in advance of the termination of the contract to decide whether it would be in the best interests of the Government to renew the old contract or to ask for new bids.

Mr. TABER. Another factor about which I would like to ask the gentleman is the changing of routes in the northeastern section of the country. According to my understanding, the northeastern section of the country was advertised for letting this year.

Mr. MEAD. That is correct.

Mr. TABER. Throughout practically all this part of the country there has been a reduction of routes so that none of the star-route carriers now on the job would be entitled to come in under the benefits of this bill.

Mr. MEAD. Oh, yes; they would.

Mr. TABER. Not the way the routes have been changed; only in those cases where the routes remained exactly the same would they come under the benefits of this bill.

Mr. MEAD. Where they remained the same or substantially the same.

Mr. TABER. It would have to be exactly the same to permit a renewal under the provisions of this bill; and they would apply to practically none of the routes that are now under consideration.

Mr. MEAD. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I think the bill would apply to a very substantial number, for the reason that the Post Office Department, anticipating the possible enactment of this bill, extended by 60 days the date when the final awards should be made; and they did this voluntarily before a resolution asking them to do that had been adopted. Had there been no possibility of the application of this bill, they probably would not have taken that action. So I believe this bill will apply in a great many cases. I may say also that the men affected would not be so much interested in either the bill or the resolution if these measures did not apply to them.

Mr. TABER. It would seem to me a funny procedure to ask people to bid and then give the contract to someone else. I doubt, frankly, if satisfactory bidders could be secured under such a plan.

Mr. MEAD. Not so long ago I took up with the Department what I thought was a very pitiful case. The carrier was serving either in the gentleman's own district or in an adjacent district. He had been there for upwards of 30 years. By reason of the fact that another bidder submitted a proposal $10 lower than his own, he was called upon to forfeit that contract. Under the terms of this bill that star-route carrier would, in my judgment, be given a renewal of his contract.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. There is nothing in this bill is there that would require the Post Office Department to call for bids? If this bill is passed it would not be necessary for the Post Office Department to call for bids at all on star routes, would it?

Mr. MEAD. Not where it can be proved that the renewal of a contract is in the best interests of the Government.

Mr. MOTT. What I mean is this, the present law requires the Post Office Department to ask for bids.

Mr. MEAD. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. If this bill is enacted into law it will be optional with the Post Office Department to ask for bids?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; but contingent upon its being in the best interests of the Postal Service. We put as many safeguards as possible into this bill.

Mr. MOTT. That is my understanding. The Department will not have to call for bids unless it wants to. If I understand the purpose of the bill correctly, it is simply to enable the Post Office Department to deal fairly with the star-route carriers in cases where it cannot deal fairly with them under existing law.

Mr. MEAD. That is correct.

Mr. MOTT. I think the bill is a very good one and a very just one, and I hope the House will pass it. I know of a number of instances where star-route carriers had been rendering satisfactory and valuable service for years, but were deprived of their contracts and their livelihood simply because some irresponsible person submitted a bid lower than the actual cost of rendering proper service. Under existing law the Post Office Department has been obliged to accept these low bids, provided the bidder could furnish a proper bond. This system is wrong. The pending bill will correct it without doing harm to anyone. The bill, therefore, should receive our support.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It seems to me it would work out something like this: There would be a sufficient time in advance of the expiration of the contract to advertise for bids, and it could be determined in that time whether it was desired to extend the existing contract or not. If that was the determination, there would be no advertising for bids. If the Department decided not to extend the contract, then bids would be called for. Would it not work out something like that?

Mr. MEAD. That will, no doubt, be the policy.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That (a) the last sentence of section 3951 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of August 11, 1876 (amending secs. 246 and 251 of the act of June 8, 1872) (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 39, sec. 434), is hereby amended to read as follows: "In all cases of regular contracts, the contract may, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, and in the interests of the Postal Service, be renewed for single periods of 4 years from date of expiration, and like renewals of such contracts may thereafter be made as often as the interests of the Service may require; or any such contract may be continued in force beyond its express terms for a period not exceeding 6 months, until a new contract with the same or another contractor shall be made by the Postmaster General."; and

(b) Such section is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"The Postmaster General may, in discretion, and in the interests of the Postal Service, allow extra pay to a contractor for (a) necessary increased travel caused by obstruction of roads, destruction of bridges, or discontinuance of ferries occurring during the contract term, when such increased travel is for not less than 1 mile and if for a period not less than 10 consecutive days (trips), or (b) where an abnormal and sustained increase in the quantity of mail develops during a contract period or after bid has been submitted, providing such increase necessitates larger capacity equipment to maintain service, or (c) where a change in schedule is ordered that will necessitate an additional unit of equipment and driver to maintain service; or the pay may be reduced where a schedule is so changed as to permit its maintenance with a reduction in units of equipment and drivers; or, instead of allowing extra pay or ordering a reduction in pay, the route may be readvertised and relet for the remainder of the contract term. No extra pay allowed or reduction in pay ordered under the provisions of this section shall be proportionately greater than the rate established by the contract involved. The provisions of section 3960 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 39, sec. 440) that no compensation shall be paid for additional service in carrying the mail until such additional service is ordered, the sum to be allowed therefor to be expressed in the order and entered upon the books of the Department, and that no compensation shall be paid for any additional regular service rendered before the issuing of such order, shall not apply to any service authorized under this paragraph.

"Where a change in schedule is ordered that will necessitate the contractor being away from the initial terminal an excessively longer period than was required in the advertised schedule, the route may be readvertised if the changed schedule is not acceptable to the contractor; or where a schedule is so changed that will permit the contractor to be away from the initial terminal a substantially shorter period than was required in the advertised schedule, the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, and in the interests of the Postal Service, readvertise the route. Less than 3 hours shall not constitute an excessively longer or substantially shorter period."

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 1, after the word "expiration", insert "at the rate prevailing at the end of the contract term"; beginning in line 10, strike out all of lines 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16 and insert the following: "The Postmaster General may, in his discretion, and in the interest of the Postal Service and under such regulations as he may prescribe, allow extra pay to a contractor for (a) necessary increased travel caused by obstruction of roads, destruction of bridges, or discontinuance of ferries occurring during the contract term, or (b) where an"; line 24, strike out "providing" and insert in lieu thereof "provided."

Page 3, line 11, after the word "involved", strike out the remainder of line 11, down to and through line 18.

Mr. JENKS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the day comes when every new Member must rise for the first time to address this body. My remarks are going to be very short.

As a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I attended the hearings and participated in the deliberations on the star-route bill which is before the House today, and I deem it a duty and a pleasure to speak in behalf of the star-route carriers, all of whom do a full day's work, and, I believe most of us will agree, should receive a full day's pay.

The purposes and aims of the Post Office Department are adequately described in those fine lines that grace the main entrances to the city post office here in the Nation's Capital, which, if you please, I would like to quote here:

Messenger of sympathy and love.
Servant of parted friends.
Consoler of the lonely.
Bond of scattered families.
Enlarger of the common life.
Carrier of news and knowledge.
Instrument of trade and industry.
Promoter of mutual acquaintance,
Of peace and good will among men and nations.

Those are the words of Dr. Charles Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard College, edited by President Woodrow Wilson.

The men affected by this bill have made these words very true. Over 3,000 of them are immediately affected by the provisions of this measure. Eventually over 11,000 will be affected, and it entails a money consideration of more than $10,000,000. These star-route carriers carry the mail in automobiles; the cost of the automobile, the upkeep, gas, depreciation, and so forth, is about 3½ cents per mile, while the average pay under the current schedule is about 7 cents. You will see, therefore, that about one-half of the $11,000,000 eventually is paid for labor.

Mr. Chairman, under the present system of bidding on these contracts, it seems to me that it comes down to a question of the Government causing men to bid against themselves for labor, which is not the spirit of today. Men are bidding on these contracts who live in rural places; many of them have no other means of livelihood. In order to be assured, or reasonably assured, of having their contracts renewed, they are underbidding themselves. In other words, they have offered bids less than what they have been carrying the mail for during the past 4 years. We have gone into all the phases of this bill today; but there are many ramifications and it seems to me that this one phase has been touched on only generally. I raise my voice here, Mr. Chairman, in behalf of these men, who in fair or stormy weather carry the mail to its destination, and who should receive from this Government an honest day's pay for the honest day's work which they give to this Government.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, so far as this bill is concerned, if I had my way about it, I would direct the Postmaster General to make this change immediately. I would not leave it to his discretion, because I believe the men who bid on these contracts 4 years ago, when we were in the depths of a depression, bid too low under those conditions.

I want to say to the men here who may not be familiar with the facts that the bids which have been submitted for these contracts for the next 4 years are less than the figures for the past 4 years. If this bill is passed, it will not increase the expense of the Government one cent; and over the period of as many years as I can find any record of the expense of the star-route carriers has been decreased every 4 years when bids have been asked for and contracts made.

In fairness to these men, may I read a part of a letter I received from one of my constituents, and I may say that there are many, many similar cases:

I registered my bid in 1933 to the Post Office Department to carry mail on this route, which requires a heavy truck one-third of the mileage (the rest may be carried in a car), for less than 7 cents per mile, which I believe is as cheap as is possible to cover this route and give good service. * * * This year it has come to me that I have been underbid on this route; and if the star-route bill is not passed I am out of a job, with a truck on my hands that has every cent I have invested in it. To convert this truck for draying purposes—and that field is very definitely limited here—I would have to spend at least $300 more. It is impossible for me to tell you what the loss of this job means to me and my family.

I looked into the status of the bid on this particular route and found that the present contractor has been underbid by $86.

I quote from another letter:

I am driving over 14 miles, 6 of which are on fifth-class roads, rough at best, and in the spring of the year all but impossible; at present I receive only $57 per month for my equipment and services.

I could go on through the numerous letters I have received, most of them portraying a worried state of mind over the possible loss of a contract that at best affords only a meager living. I do not believe that these men who have been giving honest, faithful, and efficient service to the Government should lose their contracts simply because someone else comes in and underbids them by a very small amount. For that reason I feel that this bill should be passed. [Applause.]

The pro-forma amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BIERMANN: Page 2, line 7, insert: "The Post Office Department shall determine what are adequate salaries for the various star routes, basing its determination on the compensation drawn by rural-route carriers for similar service, and in no case shall the pay of star-route carriers be less than the determined adequate salaries."

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, the star-route carriers are the lowest paid class of employees in the Postal Service, so far as I know; and, so far as I know, they are the only employees hired in this manner. They are compelled to bid for their jobs, and their bids include not only their own services, but the use of machinery and the upkeep of machinery, as well as the buying of oil and gas and other supplies for their machines. The result of this system is that the man who is in the greatest need and knows least about what he is bidding on gets the route.

I was interested in the statement of the gentleman who preceded me. He stated that each succeeding 4 years the bids have been lower, if I did not misunderstand the gentleman, indicating that the pay of these men has been increasingly inadequate.

My amendment simply puts these men on the same basis as rural-route carriers, and I do not know of any reason in equity why they should not be paid about as rural-route carriers are paid. Suppose the difference between what they bid and adequate compensation is $500 a year. There are about 11,000 of these star-route carriers. Only one-fourth of them bid each year, but assume the entire 11,000 are involved, and we raised the pay of each one $500 a year. This would amount to only five and a half million dollars a year and would put these people on a basis of decency and fair pay, which we should certainly want to give them.

I do not believe the Post Office Department ought to spend a single dollar inefficiently or for a useless purpose, but, on the other hand, I do not believe the Post Office Department ought to be in the business of grinding down any class of its employees. This amendment simply proposes to put them on a basis of decent pay, and I earnestly hope the Committee will agree to the amendment.

If anybody has any good reason why it should not be adopted, I would like to have him use some of my time and tell me.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. Yes.

Mr. MASON. I agree that the gentleman's amendment is well intentioned, but impractical, because it speaks of salaries, and these gentlemen that we are talking about are not on salaries; they are on contracts, a good many of them corporations that secure the route; and then the gentleman's amendment also speaks of similar service. There is no such thing as similar service between the rural-route carrier and these men. This is a distinctly different service. There are shades in which the one runs into the other, it is true, but, as a whole, it is a distinctively different service; and, while I commend the gentleman on the intention of his amendment, I cannot see that we can be practical and adopt it.

Mr. BIERMANN. I do not believe that the service on a rural route and the service on a star route are so dissimilar, but that the intelligence of the Post Office Department can work out a similar compensation for something like similar service.

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. Yes.

Mr. HAINES. I may say to the gentleman that the committee has been considering the subject matter that he has brought to the attention of the House, but the gentleman must appreciate the fact that the star-route carriers are not under the classified civil service and do not perform the same sort of work that the rural letter carrier performs in selling money orders and stamps.

Mr. BIERMANN. That could be taken into consideration in determining the salaries.

Mr. HAINES. I am much in sympathy with what the gentleman has in mind, but I really believe that the committee, if given an opportunity, will work this matter out in an equitable manner, and fairly so to the star-route carrier.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BIERMANN. I appreciate the good intention of the committee, and I think this bill is a step in the right direction, but it is a very short step. There is nothing in the bill that will prevent a situation like this. Say a star route is now being hauled for $1,800 a year, and it is inadequate compensation for the service the man performs and the upkeep of his equipment.

The fact that the star-route carrier is paid $1,800 is posted, with a call for bids. The other bidders of course know that they have to bid under that in order to get the route, and they all bid under that. The bill provides that if there is not much difference between the lowest bid and the bid of the present carrier, the present carrier gets it. But let us say there is a difference of $200 a year, then the new man gets it, and as the gentleman said who preceded me, every 4 years the pay is lower and lower and lower. I don't think that is the sort of situation that this committee ought to encourage or continue, if it can help it.

Mr. HAINES. The committee is very much in sympathy with what the gentleman is saying and we have been trying to improve this condition right along. I might say to the gentleman that the bill which is before the House today has the approval of the star-route carriers.

Mr. BIERMAN. The gentleman will not say that the star-route carriers would not equally approve my amendment as they approve the bill.

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. Yes.

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Merely to say that this bill is approved by the star-route carriers. They want this bill.

Mr. BIERMANN. Without my amendment?

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. BIERMANN. They earnestly want my amendment also.

Mr. PIERCE. I say to the gentleman that the committee here which represents the star-route men have so informed me. They want this bill passed as it came from the committee. It is all they hope to get at this time.

Mr. BIERMANN. The gentleman will not say that the star-route carriers would not want to see a provision written into the bill that would provide adequate salaries for them?

Mr. PIERCE. But the star-route carriers are satisfied with the bill as it comes from the committee, and so suggested to me in my office this morning. It is not all they want, nor that I would be willing to vote for, but it is all that they expect at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I notice on page 6, line 24, these words occur:

Or a legal residence within the counties adjoining such county or counties.

That has reference to those who may bid on these contracts. It seems to me that it should be limited to the residents of the county where the route emanates or passes through. I would like to know if the committee has in mind a change in that language.

Mr. HAINES. No. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. HAINES. As the gentleman knows there is a lot of busses that carry the mail, and that are incorporated in several counties and States.

Mr. GREEN. But, I think, in line 25, that is taken care of. The bill reads:

Except, that proposals for carrying the mail tendered by firms, companies—

And so forth. They are excepted. It seems to me that the one who bids on these contracts should be a resident of the counties concerned where the route begins or where it passes through and I hope the committee will consent to an amendment of that kind. I favor the other portions of the bill. It is needed legislation.

Mr. MEAD. I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. GREEN. It has not yet been offered.

Mr. MEAD. I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

The star-route service is a long-range service. A route may traverse several counties. It may come within a mile of another county. A fourth-class post office may be instituted in that county just a mile away from the star route. Because it is an adjacent or contiguous county we want to allow the star-route carrier to serve that county. We want this service to be expanded continuously. We want no restrictions geographically that would confine a star-route carrier to a particular county within a route at the time the contract is issued. This is different from the rural carrier service and the village carrier service. It covers great expanses of country, and when we restrict it to the counties within the route or adjacent counties we are making some headway along the line suggested by the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN. Then it is restricted to the adjacent county?

Mr. MEAD. That is right.

Mr. GREEN. I am heartily in favor of the bill. It should have been passed long ago.

Mr. MEAD. It is more restricted than existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

The question arises on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BIERMANN].

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, may the amendment be again read by the Clerk?

Without objection, the Clerk again reported the amendment offered by Mr. BIERMANN.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Section 3945 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes", approved June 23, 1874 (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 39, sec. 426), is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Every application for renewal of contract for carrying the mail shall be accompanied by the bond of the applicant, with sureties approved by a postmaster, and in cases where the amount of the bond exceeds $5,000, by a postmaster of the first, second, or third class, in a sum of the same amount stated in the current contract, or of an amount designated by the Postmaster General, and of which the applicant has been notified before forwarding application for renewal; and in case of failure of any applicant to renew such contract, or, having renewed a contract, in case of failing to perform service according to his contract, he and his sureties shall be liable for the amount of said bond as liquidated damages, to be recovered in an action of debt on the said bond. No application shall be considered unless it shall be accompanied by such bond, and there shall have been affixed to said application the oath of the applicant, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that he has the ability, pecuniarily, to fulfill his obligations, and that the application is made in good faith, and with the intention to renew the contract and perform the service in case his application is accepted."

SEC. 3. Section 3946 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by such act of August 11, 1876 (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 39, sec. 427), is hereby amended by inserting after the word "bidder" in such section a comma and the following: "or applicant for renewal of contract."

SEC. 4. Section 8 of the act entitled "An act to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing the Postal Savings System, and for other purposes", approved May 18, 1916, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 39, sec. 434), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 8. That whenever an accepted bidder or applicant for renewal of the contract shall fail to enter into or renew contract, or a contractor on any mail route shall fail or refuse to perform the service on said route according to his contract, or when a new route shall be established or new service required, or when, from any other cause, there shall not be a contract legally bound or required to perform such service, the Postmaster General may make a temporary contract for carrying the mail on such route, without advertisement for such period as may be necessary, not in any case exceeding 1 year, until the service shall have commenced under a contract made according to law: Provided, That the cost of temporary service rendered necessary by reason of the failure of any accepted bidder or applicant for renewal of contract to enter into contract or a contractor to perform service shall be charged to such bidder, applicant, or contractor: Provided further, That the provisions of section 3960, Revised Statutes (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 39, sec. 440), that no compensation shall be paid for additional service in carrying the mail until such additional service is ordered, the sum to be allowed therefor to be expressed in the order and entered upon the books of the department, and that no compensation shall be paid for any additional regular service rendered before the issuing of such order, shall not apply to any service authorized under this act."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 6, line 19, strike out the word "act" and insert the word "section"; page 6, line 21, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 5. Proposals for carrying the mail on star routes shall not be considered unless the bidder is a legal resident of the county or counties traversed by the roads over which the mails are to be carried, or a legal resident within the counties adjoining such county or counties; except, that proposals for carrying the mail tendered by firms, companies, or corporations shall be considered provided such firms, companies, or corporations are actually engaged in business within the counties to residence in which individuals are herein restricted."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 4408, directed him to report the same back to the House with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros?

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

On motion by Mr. MEAD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EQUIPMENT ALLOWANCE TO THIRD-CLASS POSTMASTERS

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I call up the bill (H. R. 2723) granting equipment allowance to third-class postmasters.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2723) granting equipment allowance to third-class postmasters, with Mr. COX in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, this bill grants an equipment allowance to third-class postmasters. A similar bill was reported by the committee in the last Congress, passed the House, but was not acted upon before adjournment by the Senate.

The pending bill will pay third-class postmasters who furnish the equipment at their offices 50 percent of the box rents which they collect.

Under present conditions, most third-class postmasters furnish their own equipment, which includes the boxes for the use of the patrons, but turn the box rents over to the Post Office Department. First- and second-class postmasters have their equipment furnished to them. Fourth-class postmasters are given an allowance for rent, fuel, and light.

In the last Congress the Department objected to a similar bill because of the expense involved—about $943,000 per annum. If 50 percent of the box rents is deemed too high, our committee would look with favor upon a proposal that would reduce it to 25 percent. The idea behind the bill is this: We have been trying for many years to have the Government own this furniture or equipment which third-class postmasters use. We want it for purposes of uniformity. We want it because if the Government standardizes this equipment it will receive more revenue, as there will be a larger number of boxes to rent. We desire it because all postmasters of first, second, and third classes are paid according to the receipts of the office, but only certain Presidential postmasters are required to equip their offices.

If the pay basis were different, this would not amount to a pay reduction; but in view of the fact that the salary of a Presidential postmaster is based entirely upon the receipts of his office, and one postmaster has to furnish equipment and another does not, the first postmaster is being discriminated against.

This problem, as I said before, has been with us for many years. Some of the third-class post offices are under lease, and at these offices the equipment is supplied by the lessor. Some third-class post offices are owned by the Government, and there the equipment is furnished; but in the third-class post offices where the equipment is furnished by the postmaster he is being discriminated against, because it is the postmaster who pays for the equipment, pays the insurance, and then turns all the income over to the Government. About 8,000 of the total number of 8,941 third-class postmasters furnish the equipment themselves or pay for it by leasing.

As far back as 1930 our committee held hearings on this subject. The Department at that time, under the former administration, agreed that the situation should be corrected and that the Government should own the equipment. The only mistake the Department made was to appear before the Appropriations Committee and ask for an appropriation sufficient to install all the equipment at one time. The chairman of the Appropriations Committee at that time objected because the appropriation involved a large sum of money.

Your committee is of the belief that if the Appropriations Committee would appropriate a small sum of money each year, eventually the Government would own all this equipment, it would be standardized, and more revenue would result from this system than from the present system. We have not, however, been able to get an appropriation from our Appropriations Committee.

The present system is bad. It is, in my judgment, the most brutal and cruel system we have in the Government service. Third-class postmasters are called upon to lease this equipment principally from one or two companies that control it, and they see to it that the lease price is so high that this equipment is paid for in at least two terms, or 8 years of service. The postmaster, however, must lease it again on the same exorbitant terms, or if he goes out of office his successor will probably lease the same furniture at the same high rate. Post-office inspectors have investigated this evident discrimination. It is a racket; it borders on a scandal; and your committee, in an attempt to rid the Service of this racketeering system, has repeatedly reported out a bill that would penalize the Department unless it furnished the equipment. That is all there is to the bill.

Mr. LORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes.

Mr. LORD. Why should not this bill take in fourth-class postmasters as well?

Mr. MEAD. Fourth-class postmasters are paid upon a different basis. Third-class postmasters are Presidential postmasters and are paid upon the same basis as postmasters at offices of the first and second class. Third-class postmasters, however, are the only ones called upon to furnish the office equipment. As I said before, fourth-class postmasters are on a different pay basis and receive an allowance for rent, fuel, and light.

Mr. LORD. Do they not furnish their own equipment just the same?

Mr. MEAD. They furnish their own equipment, but their salary is established on the cancelations of the office.

Mr. LORD. Their salary is not much.

Mr. MEAD. No; their salary is not much.

Mr. LORD. I know, for at one time I had the post office in my building. I know that fourth-class postmasters do not get very much. I am just wondering why this bill should not be extended to them as well as to the third-class postmasters.

Mr. MEAD. They are not included in this bill because they are paid differently. However, our committee is considering a bill to reclassify the salaries of fourth-class postmasters.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. What would happen under this bill where the landlord has acquired title to the fixtures and has already outstanding a contract with the Government?

Mr. MEAD. He leases his building, together with the equipment therein, to the Government in the competitive market, and in such cases the postmasters do not supply the equipment.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. What would happen in such cases under this bill were it to become law?

Mr. MEAD. Then all the equipment would be owned either by the Government or by the landlord. In no case would we discriminate against individual postmasters.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. In other words, the owner of the building under this bill, already having a contract to lease to the Government for a stated number of years, would not draw extra compensation?

Mr. MEAD. It would not affect him at all.

Mr. LORD. The Government would continue to get the proceeds?

Mr. MEAD. That is right. It would affect only the postmasters who buy, rent, or lease the equipment themselves.

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. I commend my distinguished chairman for the fine statement he has made about this bill. Is it not true that under this bill considerable work would be created through rehabilitating and refinishing this furniture?

Mr. MEAD. There is no doubt about that. In addition, the Treasury Department has turned over to the Post Office Department thousands upon thousands of lockboxes. The Post Office Department has repeatedly asked us and our Appropriations Committee for enough money to put them into shape. If this is passed, all of these lockboxes, in my judgment, would be put into shape and installed in the post offices without delay. This bill is only for the purpose of expediting a system that has been too long delayed.

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. I think it is a very good bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am in favor of this bill and I think every Member should be, but I want to know whether this puts the third-class post offices on the same basis as the first- and second-class post offices?

Mr. MEAD. So far as equipment is concerned, it eliminates that apparent discrimination.

Mr. HOUSTON. If you changed the percentage of receipts, they still would be handicapped?

Mr. MEAD. Yes. There would be a penalty sufficient to create the urge for the Post Office Department to expedite the day when they would own all of this equipment in third-class post offices.

Mr. HOUSTON. And in all fairness to the first-class postmasters, this bill should be passed?

Mr. MEAD. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. GREEN. I appreciate the fact the committee has brought out this bill for consideration. We have had a strong urge for it in our State.

Here is one of the peculiar situations: Many third-class postmasters will be appointed acting postmasters. They have to buy, lease, or furnish the equipment. The old postmaster, in many instances, has bought the furniture. He is confronted with either holding up the new postmaster or sacrificing his equipment. He usually sacrifices it by selling for probably 25 percent of what it cost him. If he charges what it is worth, the new postmaster, who may be there for only 2 or 3 months, is unable to pay for it. I have known two or three instances where the old postmaster held that as a club over the new postmaster to appoint somebody as clerk. All of these unseen transactions go on. The Government should own this equipment and not put this responsibility upon third-class postmasters.

Mr. MEAD. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this measure.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman a member of the committee?

Mr. LUDLOW. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any member of the committee who desires recognition in opposition to the bill? If not, the gentleman is recognized.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I am bothered a great deal about this particular bill. I want to cooperate with the distinguished gentleman from New York in connection with the splendid service which he renders to his country as chairman of the legislative committee having to do with postal affairs. [Applause.] I compliment him on some of the measures that have been presented by him and passed today, which I think were salutary and in the public interest. However, as I said, I am bothered about this bill. I am perhaps bothered all the more by reason of the fact I happen to be a member of the Appropriations Committee and chairman of the subcommittee thereof which has to do with postal expenditures. That probably makes me a little sensitive as to my responsibility in regard to the expenditure of money.

Mr. Chairman, I am concerned about the charge which this bill would impose upon the Treasury of the United States, among other things. I am authorized to say that the Post Office Department and the Bureau of the Budget are hoping this bill will not be passed.

I have before me a memorandum from Hon. W. W. Howes, Acting Postmaster General, in regard to this bill, and, with the permission of the House, I should like to read it for the light it throws on this proposition.

This memorandum reads as follows:

> At the present time the Department is furnishing to post offices of the third class, lockboxes taken from public buildings demolished or no longer used for post-office purposes and from vacated leased quarters where the Department owns the equipment. Miscellaneous equipment other than lockboxes is also transferred when available. Approximately 73,000 lockboxes which have been transferred to this Department by the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department have been installed in post offices of the third class. Twenty-seven thousand of these boxes were transferred and installed in the same condition in which removed, and while they have been used for a number of years will be serviceable for many more years. The remaining 46,000 boxes were reconditioned before installation. The Comptroller of the Post Office Department advises that the average of the box rentals for all post offices of the third class for the last 5 years was $1,984,675.86 a year, or an average of $201.67 per office. Under this average for the approximately 7,300 offices affected by the proposed legislation the estimated total box rents at such offices would be $1,472,191. If 50 percent of these revenues were returned to the postmasters, the annual expenditure involved would be about $736,000.
> In view of the fact that the passage of H. R. 2723 would involve additional expenditures of $736,000 or more annually, and the further fact that the Department is already furnishing partial equipment, including lockboxes, to post offices of the third class, this Department is of the opinion that favorable consideration should not be given to the legislation embodied in H. R. 2723. It has been ascertained from the Bureau of the Budget that this report is in accord with the program of the President.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe I have anything more to add. I regret to see a proposition brought forward here which adds $736,000 annually to the postal expenditures, which are already enormous. There does not seem to be any special demand for this legislation coming from any quarter. The Post Office Department and the Bureau of the Budget hope this bill will not be passed. I submit the matter for the consideration of the Members of the House in connection with the condition of the Treasury and the attitude expressed by the officials who are responsible for the Postal Service.

Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] such time as he may desire.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I hope this bill will not be passed. It will add another burden of a million dollars a year to the Treasury of the United States. Most of these third-class postmasters are able to take over the equipment of their predecessor that the predecessor owned, or are able to buy at very small expense the equipment which is for sale somewhere else. That is not a heavy burden. These postmasters are allowed their rent, heat, and the cost of this equipment that they own is not very much of a burden on them. They are all tickled to death to get the job as postmaster. There are always a dozen applicants for every position of that character anywhere in the United States. They are able to get along and are in better shape than their neighbors in the community.

If we go ahead and pass every bill that comes along which adds a million dollars or nearly a million dollars to the expense of the Government, regardless of the recommendations of the Post Office Department and regardless of the recommendations of the Budget, it is not going to be possible to keep things in decent shape as far as the Treasury is concerned. As a result of the bills that we have passed, there is today a very considerable postal deficit, and unless we pass a bill extending the 3-cent postage rate on letters for a longer period the deficit for next year will run upward of a hundred million dollars. These increases that we in the Congress of the United States have imposed upon the cost of the operations of the Post Office Department will prevent a reduction in the letter postage rate unless we want to carry over the tremendous deficit.

Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to consider these things very carefully before we pass a bill of this kind and, therefore, I hope the Members of the House will reject it.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCFARLANE].

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I hope this bill will receive our favorable consideration. It ought to, and I am sure it will if we all understand the fundamental issues involved.

Now, what does this bill do? It does just this: It allows 50 percent of the box rents collected to go to the postmasters in these third-class post offices until the Government is able to buy and own this third-class post-office equipment. Is there anything wrong about this? Certainly not. To argue against this bill is to argue that it is wrong for the Government to own this equipment for the first- and second-class offices. This measure will simply put these overworked and underpaid third-class postmasters in identically the same status as the higher paid first- and second-class postmasters.

What does a third-class postmaster receive? The average salary, according to the hearings, of the third-class postmasters in the United States is $1,700 a year, and yet in the case of the higher paid postmasters, who receive up to several thousand dollars a year, the Government furnishes all of this equipment and pays him in addition thereto, based on receipts, the same basic pay as the third-class postmasters, who either has to buy or rent his own equipment for his little office and pay for the equipment out of his measly salary.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. I yield for a question.

Mr. MOTT. Can the gentleman tell us the average cost to a third-class postmaster in the rental of this equipment?

Mr. McFARLANE. I put that information in the RECORD when I offered an amendment to strike out the provision in the Post Office appropriation bill the other day. That provision you remember prohibited any part of the appropriation from being used by the Post Office Department to purchase post-office lockboxes for these third-class offices. I believe it was shown that the average rental is somewhat more than $300 a year.

It has been stated here that this 50 percent of the lockbox receipts would average a little over $200 a year, and this still would not entirely equalize the situation.

Furthermore, these 8,000 or 9,000 postmasters, under this bill, will not be placed in the same status as the first- and second-class postmasters even when this bill becomes a law.

The Post Office Department came before the Committee on Appropriations and asked for $100,000 and stated that with that money and the post-office equipment they have on hand, that they could furnish these postmasters—within a few years they could supply most of the third-class postmasters—with this furniture. They were turned down by the Appropriations Committee. I have talked with the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, Mr. Purdum, and he is highly in favor of this $100,000 appropriation. The same measure as now pending was passed unanimously by this House in 1935.

Mr. MOTT. I am also in favor of the legislation.

Mr. McFARLANE. I see no reason why we should not pass this legislation unanimously now and do justice to the third-class postmasters of the country. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I shall need all of the 5 minutes. I have been interested in this discussion. I think there is merit in the proposed legislation, but I do not believe it should be passed at this particular time.

I was interested in hearing the letter read from the Department, in which the Department practically states to the Congress that this legislation is not needed. As has been heretofore stated, those of us who are in close touch with conditions throughout the country realize there is no difficulty about getting postmasters to serve. They are most anxious to serve in all the third-class offices, without fastening on the Government and the taxpayers at this particular time an additional burden of $1,000,000. If this legislation is wholesome, it can be considered in the course of years to come, when we shall be further removed from necessary emergency expenditures, such as have been occasioned in the last year or two by floods on the one hand and droughts on the other. With relief bills sought by our people and with distress upon every hand, I think it is well that as the legislative branch of the Government we should slow down on increasing the expenses of government, on the already overburdened taxpayers.

There is no trouble about leasing post-office buildings or equipment. The only difficulty you have is in finding enough appointments to satisfy the applicants for these third-class post offices. You will have 40 and sometimes 50 wanting the same job, and they are willing and anxious at this particular time to furnish the equipment. It may be that this legislation would be desirable at another or a different time in the future but not now.

I want to commend what has been said by the chairman of the committee. For him I have a most wholesome and a high regard, just as I have for every member of the Post Office Committee. They practically say to us not to pass this measure with a 50-percent allowance, but why pass it at all at this particular time? Let us save this $1,000,000, and let us undertake to pay it out, if we must, to somebody else who is much more in need and in greater distress in this country than the third-class postmasters or those who furnish the buildings in which the third-class post offices are housed. This, in brief, is my message to the House. Certainly there is not the emergency that would require us to pass this particular bill at this particular time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, there is another phase of this matter which I desire to present to the Committee. I want every person employed in the Government service to receive liberal compensation, but I want that compensation to be just and not discriminatory. This bill provides that an allowance equal to 50 percent of the receipts of the office shall be paid to the postmasters of these third-class post offices. No one knows what the receipts of the office might be. In some cases there might be an over amount and in some cases there might be an under amount, and we would have the widest disparity of compensation of those postmasters, which is not right. Some would be the fair-haired favorite, and others would be discriminated against. There is no justice in this bill. It would be extremely partial and discriminatory in its application. If this matter of increasing the compensation of third-class postmasters is to be undertaken, it should be undertaken in a more scientific way by the legislative committee, of which the able gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] is the chairman. They should go into the matter thoroughly and weigh all the factors of compensation, so as to provide equality of compensation and not unfair, discriminatory, and haphazard compensation such as is provided by this bill.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Would there be any way to safeguard the Government if you should put all this equipment on the market? Suppose they unloaded a whole lot of this second-hand equipment.

Mr. LUDLOW. I am not familiar with what might happen there, but I think the gentleman's point is well taken.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

Mr. TABER. According to my information, this item, if passed, would call for an average payment to each third-class postmaster of $100. My information is that the cost to these third-class postmasters for this equipment, the actual cost, runs anywhere from $20 to $50 a year, added, so you are just handing them something right out of the Treasury.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOSER].

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I happen to have been a post-office inspector, and in my experience I transferred many post offices and I am quite familiar with the management of third-class as well as all classes of post offices. In some cases there have been leases made by the Government for third-class post offices where the Government required of the landlord the installation of the necessary equipment, and in all my years of experience I never found the slightest difficulty on the part of a postmaster, nor the slightest disposition on the part of any postmaster, to avoid supplying the equipment, if he could get the job. We have applicants clamoring for these positions and have conflicts in our respective communities for these appointments, but there is not the slightest bit of doubt on the part of any Member of the House that he can supply the needs of the Department for a postmaster, if this bill is not passed. I have seen equipment practically given by the outgoing postmaster to his successor, and I have seen successors who obstinately refuse to accept it at a very nominal figure and purchased brand-new equipment merely to satisfy a grudge against the outgoing postmaster. There is not the slightest disposition on the part of people not to accept the position of postmaster or not to seek it because of the difficulties that would be entailed in supplying the equipment. I do not feel it is good policy to change this and let down the bars by establishing a precedent. These postmasters are provided with a salary fixed according to the receipts of the offices, as allowed by law.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. The salary of the third-class postmasters is $2,000 and something, is it not?

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. It is based upon the receipts. Some are considerably lower. I believe it was testified here that the average is $1,700.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. TERRY. Do fourth-class offices get their equipment furnished?

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. No; in no instance. A fourth-class postmaster advanced to third class carries his equipment with him or acquires such additional as he may need.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Does the Government furnish the equipment for the second-class post offices?

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. They furnish it through the lease negotiated with the lessor or landlord they rent from or own it as equipment of the Federal building.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BIERMANN].

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I want this time merely to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MITCHELL] a question. I was interested in his observation that there is no trouble getting plenty of men to serve in these third-class post offices. Is it not a fact that they are so anxious to serve that some of them get very mad if you do not give them the opportunity to serve?

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. The gentleman answered his own question 1,000 percent.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after July 1, 1937, postmasters at third-class offices in which post-office fixtures and equipment are not provided by the Post Office Department shall be paid, as allowances for personally owned or rented post-office fixtures and equipment, an amount equal to 50 percent of the box rents collected at such offices, the allowances to be paid quarterly, under such rules and regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe: Provided, That when post-office fixtures and equipment are furnished by the Post Office Department at post offices of the third class, the provisions of this act shall become inoperative.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Cox, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 2723, directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

HOUR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

EQUIPMENT ALLOWANCE TO THIRD-CLASS POSTMASTERS

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee) there were ayes 93 and noes 21.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 305, nays 32, not voting 93, as follows:

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the House, pursuant to its order heretofore entered, adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, March 4, 1937, at 11 o'clock a. m.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION

The Committee on Education will hold a hearing on H. R. 4582, "To amend the act, approved August 4, 1919, as amended, providing additional aid for the American Printing House for the Blind", at 10:30 a. m. Thursday, March 4, 1937, in the committee room, 416 House Office Building.

COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS

There will be a meeting of the Committee on Military Affairs at 10:30 o'clock a. m. March 4, 1937. Business to be considered: H. R. 1954, "To prevent profiteering in time of war and to equalize the burdens of war and thus provide for the national defense and promote peace."

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

407. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the legislative establishment, House of Representatives, for the fiscal year 1937, amounting to $2,500 (H. Doc. No. 162); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

408. A letter from the secretary, Railroad Retirement Board, transmitting the report of the Railroad Retirement Board for the period ending June 30, 1936; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

409. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, dated March 1, 1937, submitting a report, together with accompanying papers and illustrations, on a preliminary examination and survey of Lake Champlain, Vt., with a view to reopening the old channel through the South Hero sand bar in the vicinity of Milton and South Hero, authorized by the River and Harbor Act approved August 30, 1935; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

410. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, dated February 23, 1937, submitting a report, together with accompanying papers and illustration, on a preliminary examination and survey of Neale Sound, Md., authorized by the River and Harbor Act approved August 30, 1935 (H. Doc. No. 159); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustration.

411. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, dated February 23, 1937, submitting a report, together with accompanying papers and illustration, on a preliminary examination and survey of Vinton Waterway, La., authorized by the River and Harbor Act approved August 30, 1935 (H. Doc. No. 160); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustration.

412. 717. Also, petition of the Council of the City of Binghamton, N. Y., stating that the council believes that the constitutional check provided by a separate and independent Federal judiciary is the sole protection of the American citizenry for oppressive taxation or ruinous costs of governmental administration which might be imposed upon taxpayers by the Federal executive and legislative departments, and that any effort by these two departments to subordinate or control the judiciary could result in impairment or destruction of that constitutional barrier against confiscation, and that the city council is therefore opposed to the proposal now pending in Congress to authorize the appointment of six additional judges to the Supreme Court of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

718. Also, petition of Claude E. Dresser and 58 residents, of West Edmeston, N. Y., protesting against the President's bill, or any substitutes permitting the executive branch of the Government to control or subordinate the judicial or the legislative powers established under the Constitution; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

719. Also, petition of the members of Afton Grange, No. 1515, Afton, Chenango County, N. Y., protesting against the President's bill, or any substitutes, permitting the executive branch of the Government to control or subordinate the judicial or legislative powers established under the Constitution; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

720. Also, petition of Thaddeus M. Weems and 60 residents, of Norwich, Chenango County, N. Y., protesting against the President's bill, or any substitutes permitting the executive branch of the Government to control or subordinate the judicial or the legislative powers established under the Constitution; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

721. Also, petition of E. B. Garner and 11 residents, of Beaver Meadow, N. Y., protesting against the President's proposal to revise the United States Supreme Court and declaring that it would weaken the Court and prepare the way for dictatorship in our country; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

722. By Mr. McCORMACK: Memorial of the General Court of Massachusetts, memorializing Congress to propose an amendment to the United States Constitution relative to the determination and establishment of minimum wages for women and children; to the Committee on Labor.

723. By Mr. MERRITT: Resolution of the Port Jervis Lodge, No. 962, Brotherhood Railway Carmen of America, recording its approval of the Supreme Court reform bill; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

724. Also, resolution of the National Association of State Aviation Officials, urging the legislative Representatives of the various States in the National Congress to develop a permanent Federal policy in regard to the installation and maintenance of such aids and airports; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

725. Also, resolution of the National Association of State Aviation Officials, pledging its full support to the securing of the establishment by the Congress, at the earliest possible moment, of a permanent, independent Federal aeronautical agency to promote and supervise all phases of civil aviation, in keeping with the broad general proposals of the Federal Aviation Commission in its report of January 1935, and its accompanying legislative proposal; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

726. Also, resolution of the National Association of State Aviation Officials, urging the State representatives in the National Congress and the Federal agencies charged with these responsibilities to supplement their present navigational aids and develop publicly owned airports and landing fields, particularly along Federal airways; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

727. Also, resolution of the National Association of State Aviation Officials, expressing, as the studied judgment of the association, the opinion that the Bureau of Air Commerce should definitely interest itself in a study of the entire subject of lighter-than-air facilities and the adaptation of this form of flight to the commercial requirements of the people of the United States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

728. Also, resolution of the National Association of State Aviation Officials, petitioning the Congress to so amend its rules and procedure as to provide for standing committees on civil aeronautics in both the Senate and House of Representatives; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

729. Also, resolution of the Lafayette Camp, No. 140, Department of New York, Sons of Union Veterans of the Civil War, unqualifiedly condemning any such legislation (affecting the Federal judiciary) as violating the basic principles of the American form of government with vicious implications, and therefore a definite menace to the liberty and best interests of the people of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

730. Also, resolution of the Allied Patriotic Societies, Inc., an alliance of some 35 patriotic organizations, opposing the bill (administration bill affecting the Federal judiciary) to increase the membership of the Supreme Court, and urging all Senators and Representatives to vote against it; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

731. Also, resolution of the League of Neighborhood Associations of New Rochelle, N. Y., a nonpolitical civic organization, representing thousands of property owners and taxpayers in New Rochelle, registering its emphatic disapproval of proposed legislation affecting the Federal judiciary; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

732. By Mr. MOTT: Eighteen petitions signed by citizens of the State of Oregon, urging that the Congress pass no law that would disturb or abridge the religious rights and privileges of all our people; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

733. Also, 16 petitions signed by citizens of the State of Oregon, urging that the Congress pass no law that would disturb or abridge the religious rights and privileges of all our people; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

734. By Mr. PFEIFER: Petition of the New York City Housing Authority, New York, concerning the Wagner-Steagall housing bill; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

735. By Mr. SHAFER of Michigan: Petition of Rev. A. E. Moor and 60 other citizens, of Hillsdale, Mich., demanding that all constitutional safeguards of an independent Supreme Court be maintained; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

736. By Mr. TEIGAN: Petition of the Marshall Farmer-Labor Club, supporting President Roosevelt's proposed reorganization of the Federal judiciary; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE

THURSDAY, MARCH 4, 1937

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal Father, whose love is unspeakable and full of glory, whose majesty is not to destroy but to save: We bless Thee for the beauty and mystery of the love of friends, knowing that therein is an exceeding great reward, a screen from bitter winds and a spring of pleasant waters.

When work and worry, waste and failure take of our strength their heavy toll, do Thou restore to us the joy of resolution that every unselfish desire may be fulfilled.

Endue us with the spirit of that courtesy which always puts others at their ease and brings out what is best, that we may grow in true greatness, which is self-imparting goodness, until we all come unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ, in whose name we offer our imperfect prayer. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Wednesday, March 3, 1937, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to read into the RECORD one short paragraph from a letter I have received from one of the most outstanding Republicans in my State, who is also a lawyer. The paragraph is as follows:

> But my particular reason for this letter to you was that the Kentucky utilities attorney tackled me on the street and asked me if he could use my name to telegraph you and other representatives there in remonstrance against the passage of this measure—

I may say the reference is to the judicial reform bill—> that he had the money to pay for all telegraph messages to you all. I remembered that he, as the representative of the utilities people in this county, had done this same thing when the holding-company measure was up before.

COURT ORDERS RESTRAINING ENFORCEMENT OF LAWS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission (with an accompanying paper) (S. Doc. No. 31), submitting the information requested by Senate Resolution 82 (agreed to on the 17th ultimo), calling for certain information concerning injunctions or judgments issued or rendered by Federal courts since March 4, 1933, in cases involving acts of Congress, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

REGULATION OF REAL-ESTATE BUSINESS IN THE DISTRICT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to define, regulate, and license real-estate brokers and real-estate salesmen; to create a Real Estate Commission in the District of Columbia; to protect the public against fraud in real-estate transactions; and for other purposes, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, favoring the enactment of legislation permitting the State of Wyoming to enact legislation to prohibit the importation into, and the sale within, that State of goods, wares, and merchandise which are produced by persons under 18 years of age, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

(See joint memorial printed in full when presented by Mr. SCHWARTZ on the 3d instant, p. 1775, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, favoring the enactment of legislation creating a National Planning Board for the purpose of carrying out the program initiated by the National Resources Committee, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

(See joint memorial printed in full when presented by Mr. SCHWARTZ on the 3d instant, p. 1775, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by Division No. 88, Order of Railway Conductors of America, of Ennis, Tex., and the Veterans' Division, Democratic National Campaign Committee, of California, Los Angeles, Calif., favoring the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate letters in the nature of petitions from Local No. 45B, Upholsterers', Carpet and Linoleum Mechanics' International Union of North America, New York City, N. Y., and Locals Nos. 121, 204, Dallas Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, of Dallas, Tex., praying for the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Marshall County Bar Association, of Moundsville, W. Va., protesting against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, or to cause the enforced retirement of any of the present Justices of that Court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I present a resolution adopted by the fiscal court of Spencer County, Ky., urging the Senators and Representatives to vote for the judicial reform bill, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the names attached, as follows:

> Resolved, That we, the fiscal court of Spencer County, Ky., unanimously endorse President Franklin D. Roosevelt's effort to increase Supreme Court to 15 members. And the whole court endorses his program fully and asks the Honorable M. M. LOGAN, Senator, and Hon. ALBEN W. BARKLEY, Senator, and our Representative, Hon. ED. CREAL, to vote for said measure or measures, and it is further ordered by said court that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to Hon. M. M. LOGAN, Hon. ALBEN W. BARKLEY, and Hon. ED. CREAL, Congressmen from this district.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I also present a petition signed by 133 members of the Louisville, Ky., bar, many of them being the most outstanding attorneys of the State, indicating their political affiliations—and Republicans, Democrats, and Independents are represented—and urging upon the Congress the enactment of the President's proposal for the reform of the judiciary. I ask that the petition may be printed in the RECORD, without the signatures, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, without the signatures attached, as follows:

We, the undersigned members of the Louisville, Ky., bar, without regard to political faith, approve and endorse the plan submitted by the President to the Congress relative to changes in the Federal judiciary system, providing in substance that when any judge of a court of the United States, who holds office during good behavior, attains the age of 70 years and who has held such for 10 consecutive years, does not retire or resign within 6 months thereafter, the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint one additional judge to the court to which the former is commissioned; and we call upon our Representatives in Congress and the two Senators from Kentucky, in the interest of sound judicial construction, to favor legislation in accordance with such plan.

Mr. LODGE presented a resolution adopted by the annual session of the State Council of Massachusetts, Order of United American Men (Beverly, Mass.), protesting against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LONERGAN presented a resolution adopted by a town meeting of citizens of Redding, Fairfield County, Conn., protesting against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALSH presented a resolution adopted by the Boston (Mass.) Housing Conference, favoring the prompt enactment of legislation to establish a permanent Federal agency to formulate and assist in the development of long-range slum clearance and low-rent housing, with the appropriation of adequate funds therefor, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a memorial from the Daughters of the Revolution, Commonwealth of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by a town meeting at Rochester, Mass., expressing full confidence in the Supreme Court of the United States and protesting against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of that Court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXEMPTION OF NAVAJOS FROM PROVISIONS OF WHEELER-HOWARD INDIAN ACT—PETITIONS

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, several weeks ago I introduced Senate bill 858, which has for its purpose the exemption of the Navajo Indians from the provisions of the Wheeler-Howard Act. Three days ago the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] introduced Senate bill 1736, which has for its purpose the repeal of the entire Wheeler-Howard Act.

I have in my hand several petitions from the Navajo Indians of New Mexico bearing on the subject, and I ask that they be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There being no objection, the petitions were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the names attached, as follows:

HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

We Navajos of Twin Lake Chapter and others from other chapters are asking you as our friend and as our Senator to raise your voice against the Indian Bureau's unfair and drastic measures in planning again to make reduction of sheep. We have had deep snow, and we are losing heavy, and some places they will lose all they have. Then what?

The sheep business, as you understand, gives us the only decent living. When we have no more sheep there Mr. Collier will dance a jig and be happy. We do not want to beg. We have been self-supporting, and we want to be that way again.

There is just a few working, and the ones that are working are the Collier pets, and they are holding secret meetings and telling the Indians that you are trying to give them allotment of land; that that is what is in your bill and a lot of other things that are not true. We hope the President of United States, Mr. Roosevelt, will appoint another man, which will be kind and build up the tribe instead of pushing them back with threats and fear, as the man now in office is doing. We could tell lot of other things, but you have heard and know of these things when you were among us.

We beg you to do all you can with your bill. We hope you can work it through.

HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

OUR FRIEND: According to the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, article I, where it begins, "or abridge the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances, etc.", we, the chapter officers, headmen, and councilmen from all sections of the reservation and of the proposed extension in New Mexico, are assembled this day for the purpose of setting forth for a redress of our grievances to the members of the Senate Indian Committee through our honorable Senators of New Mexico.

It is with mutual consent that we do now present to you matters that have caused our greatest concern because the Indian Bureau openly has reached beyond the limit in which some unpardonable wrong they have inflicted upon our people, which have necessitated our grievance and of which we ask redress. These matters we refer to are as follows:

1. The treaty of 1868 made between our Navajo people and the United States has deliberately been laid aside and ignored and broken by the Indian Bureau. Let us state what we mean. In recent date our entire reservation has been divided into many districts, very much against the wish of the people. In this, in spite of our protest, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs ordered division made whether we liked it or not. The section 10 of our treaty with the Government plainly states that, "The reservation—which may be held in common shall be of any validity or force against said Indians unless agreed to and executed by at least three-fourths of all the adult male Indians occupying or interested in the same, etc." The division was made without our consent. We want this privilege to vote—whether the people would want this division of land.

2. The representatives of the Government, at the time they were in authority on our reservation, in good faith had made promises to us that at the conclusion of a canal—the Fruitland project—for irrigation, each Navajo farmer would be assigned 20 acres of land which, as was promised, was not in accord with the land law, "allotments of such irrigable lands to be made to the Indians entitled thereto in such areas as may be for their best interest, not to exceed, however, 40 acres to any one Indian, etc." (reenacted June 25, 1910, 36 Stat. L. 859), while in the treaty of 1868 makes provision where any Indian wishes to farm is entitled to 160 acres as long as he wishes to cultivate it. Instead of carrying out promises made in regard to this land matter, again Mr. Collier, who claims to be a friend of the Indians, said Navajos are not entitled to 20 acres of land; give them 10 acres if they want it. We believe the Government, because we made treaty with it, but we have no faith in the dealing of the present Indian heads.

3. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs have caused our tribal council to go in default and has broken it down completely, without regard to the people. We do not approve of his despotic attitude toward our people. At the present time, with his approval, one man who claims to be an Indian has made arrangement that a small number of men—some nonmembers of the council—to form an executive committee, who are touring the reservation and making selection of Indians they want for the new council which Collier is trying to form. This committee is holding meetings daily, including Sundays. We ask, Has Congress at any time allowed the people to hold election of Congressmen on Sunday? All meetings held on Sunday should be null and void.

4. Our people, as never before, are having a pretty tough time, due to shortage of food and clothing, caused by unmerciful reduction of their sheep and goats by the Indian Bureau. It is very fortunate that snow has come to our section, which might give a little moist, and that grass may grow; but we know well enough that, as always the case, when the March wind begins to blow there wouldn't be any sign of moist or grass. There will be dust storms for days, and that is the time when a great many more sheep will perish.

5. We believe, and therefore ask, that for justice to the people in our State of New Mexico be allowed to have an agency and a superintendent with all power to look after the entire interest and of the property of the Indians on the New Mexico side of the line. Our people must abide under the laws of New Mexico. We believe this to be just, rather than try to live under the laws of two States.

6. Finally, in conclusion, we want to express our approval and heartily endorse the bill you recently introduced, which has caused considerable unrest and disgust, especially among those Indians who are drawing some fat pay from the Indian Service. The time has come that we of the State of New Mexico who believe in practical education, good health institutions, and a general progress of our reservation are looking to the time when we can proudly consider ourselves on equal footing with our fellow citizens of our State to exercise our freedom of citizenship. We cannot always remain as wards of the Government, which the Indian Bureau wants us to do by accepting a segregation law. We do not approve of the discouraging and unhopeful words of the Secretary of the Interior when he said at the beginning of his administration, "We want to encourage him (Indian) to live his own life in his own way."

You have our undivided approval and support in your fight in behalf of the New Mexico Navajos. We certainly do not want to come under the Indian Reorganization Act. We can furnish any evidence on any matter taken place within our reservation to show that the self-rule is not the proper thing for the Navajos.

Respectfully, we are,

——— ———.

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES, 1936

Mr. LONERGAN, from the Special Committee to Investigate Campaign Expenditures of Presidential, Vice Presidential, and Senatorial Candidates in 1936, under Senate Resolution 225 (74th Cong.), as extended by Senate Resolution 7 (75th Cong.), submitted a report (No. 151) covering the activities of that committee.

NATIONAL ECONOMIC COUNCIL

Mr. BYRNES, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, reported back favorably, without amendment, the resolution (S. Res. 19) submitted by Mr. BULKLEY on January 6, 1937, which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That Senate Resolution 114, Seventy-fourth Congress, agreed to August 24, 1935, authorizing the Committee on Manufactures to investigate the desirability of establishing a National Economic Council, and for other purposes, hereby is continued in full force and effect during the Seventy-fifth Congress.

INTERSTATE AIR COMMERCE ACCIDENTS—LIMIT OF EXPENDITURES

Mr. BYRNES. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably, with an amendment, Senate Resolution 75. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 75) which had been previously, February 2, 1937, reported by Mr. COPELAND from the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was, in line 4, after the word "by", to strike out "$3,500" and insert "$2,500", so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the limit of expenditures under Senate Resolution 146, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session, agreed to June 7, 1935, to investigate certain airplane accidents and interstate air commerce, is hereby increased by $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 1776) for the relief of Louis S. Jones; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 1777) granting a pension to Lina Buckley; and

A bill (S. 1778) granting a pension to Carrie Gibbon; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma:

A bill (S. 1779) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the attorney general of the State of California to bring suit in the Court of Claims on behalf of the Indians of California", approved May 18, 1928 (45 Stat. L. 602), by amending certain portions thereof and by adding certain provisions thereto; and

A bill (S. 1780) authorizing the payment of a pension of $40 per month to all persons who have served 20 years or more as members of the Indian police at any agency in the United States of America; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. GILLETTE:

A bill (S. 1781) granting a pension to Charles French; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 1782) to provide for a survey of certain portions of the Connecticut and Chicopee Rivers, with a view to the controlling of floods; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. NORRIS:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 95) authorizing and directing the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation with respect to alleged efforts of privately owned public utilities unfairly to control public opinion concerning municipal or public ownership of electrical generating or distributing facilities; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

H. R. 2006. An act to permit certain special-delivery messengers to acquire a classified status through noncompetitive examination;

H. R. 2723. An act granting equipment allowance to third-class postmasters;

H. R. 3609. An act to protect the salaries of rural letter carriers who transfer from one rural route to another;

H. R. 4285. An act to increase the salaries of letter carriers in the village delivery service; and

H. R. 4408. An act to provide for the renewal of star-route contracts at 4-year intervals, and for other purposes.

INVESTIGATION OF RECEIVERSHIP AND BANKRUPTCY PROCEEDINGS—REFERENCE OF RESOLUTION

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, Senate Resolution 15, continuing certain resolutions relating to the investigation of bankruptcy and receivership proceedings in Federal courts, submitted by the junior Senator from California [Mr. McADOO] on January 6, 1937, and referred that day to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, has been considered by that committee. It has not been acted on by the Judiciary Committee, and therefore I ask that it be referred to that committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY—ADDRESS BY JUSTICE WILLIAM H. BLACK

[Mr. ROBINSON asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a radio address on the subject of the proposed reorganization of the Federal judiciary delivered by Justice William Harmon Black, of the Supreme Court of New York, Sunday evening, Feb. 28, 1937, which appears in the Appendix.]

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY—ARTICLE BY FRANKLYN WALTMAN

[Mr. TYDINGS asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article by Franklyn Waltman dealing with the proposed reorganization of the Federal judiciary, published in the Washington Post of Sunday, Feb. 21, 1937, which appears in the Appendix.]

MATHEMATICS OF DEMOCRACY—THE SUPREME COURT

[Mr. LA FOLLETTE asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a bulletin entitled "The Mathematics of Democracy", issued by the National Popular Government League, which appears in the Appendix.]

THE STATE UNIVERSITY IN THE SCHEME OF EDUCATION—ADDRESS BY L. D. COFFMAN

[Mr. TYDINGS asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered on Feb. 11, 1937, by L. D. Coffman, president of the University of Minnesota, at the one hundred and thirtieth anniversary banquet of the University of Maryland, on the subject "The Place of the State University in the National and State Scheme of Education", which appears in the Appendix.]

PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE BEFORE FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

[Mr. WHEELER asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address on the subject of the practice and procedure before the Federal Communications Commission, delivered by Hampson Gary, general counsel, before the Georgetown University Law Alumni Club on Jan. 28, 1937, which appears in the Appendix.]

THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. Under the unanimous-consent agreement entered into yesterday the calendar will be called for the consideration of unobjected bills.

RESOLUTION AND BILL PASSED OVER

The resolution (S. Res. 8) limiting debate on general appropriation bills was announced as first in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 5) to prevent the adulteration, misbranding, and false advertisement of food, drugs, devices, and cosmetics in interstate, foreign, and other commerce subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, for the purposes of safeguarding the public health, preventing deceit upon the purchasing public, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, with respect to this bill, known as the pure food and drug bill, a number of Senators who are not present today are interested and desire to be here when the measure is taken up for consideration. So far as my information goes, it may be proceeded with early next week. It cannot be considered today. I ask that it be passed over.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I add to what the Senator from Arkansas has just stated that we have received a number of proposed amendments from Senators, and it would help the committee very much, if there are other amendments to be proposed, if they might be placed in our hands at the earliest possible moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

STEPHEN SOWINSKI

The bill (S. 510) for the relief of Stephen Sowinski was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Stephen Sowinski, late of Casual Detachment, Second United States Field Artillery, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 4th day of August 1909 for disability of epilepsy (grand mal) incurred in the service in line of duty: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

MICHAEL J. QUINN

The bill (S. 687) authorizing the Secretary of War to bestow the Silver Star upon Michael J. Quinn was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, notwithstanding the provisions of the act of May 26, 1928, the Secretary of War is authorized to pass upon the recommendations now in the War Department for the award of the Silver Star citation to Michael J. Quinn, late of Battery B, Seventh Regiment United States Field Artillery, and, if such recommendations are found sufficient under the law governing the award of the Silver Star, to award such decoration to Michael J. Quinn.

JOINT RESOLUTION AND BILLS PASSED OVER

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 73) providing for the construction and maintenance of a National Gallery of Art was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the joint resolution was introduced and reported by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], who is necessarily absent. I suggest that it go over until his return.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 761) for the relief of the State of Massachusetts was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 294) for the relief of Elmer Blair was announced as next in order.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I ask that the bill go over. It is my own bill. I wish to wait until I secure further information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ALVIN C. YORK

The bill (S. 1236) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Sgt. Alvin C. York as a major in the United States Army and then place him on the retired list was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] if the War Department approves of the bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall be glad to give the Senator the facts which the committee ascertained in connection with the matter, as we made a very careful inquiry into it, if he so desires.

Mr. BACHMAN. Mr. President, I desire further information and ask that the bill may be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over at the request of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. ROBINSON subsequently said: Mr. President, with respect to Calendar No. 121, Senate bill 1236, I should like to make a brief statement, if I may do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not like to have the bill go over. During the World War the beneficiary of the proposed legislation demonstrated notable, inspiring gallantry in the service. I recall that it has been stated by military authorities that in all the instances of heroism during that great conflict none exceeded in courage and daring that which is associated with the name of Alvin C. York. It is appropriate that some action be taken to signalize the appreciation of the country and of the public for his unusual and gallant services.

If there is occasion to delay consideration of the bill, an objection can, of course, be interposed, but I would not be governed by a mere formal objection on the part of authorities in a department of Government who feel that the retirement privilege should not be granted to anyone except an officer or soldier in the Regular Army of the United States.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The bill has passed the Senate on several former occasions.

Mr. ROBINSON. If it meets with the approval of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN], who introduced the bill and a moment ago asked that it go over, I ask unanimous consent to recur to Calendar 121, Senate bill 1236, in order that the Senate may consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 1236) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Sgt. Alvin C. York as a major in the United States Army and then place him on the retired list was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Sgt. Alvin C. York, late of Company G, Three Hundred and Twenty-eighth Infantry, United States Army, an officer with the rank of major in the United States Army and then to place him on the retired list in that grade.

JESSE W. SMITH

The bill (S. 722) for the relief of Jesse W. Smith was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Jesse W. Smith, late of the Medical Department, Fort Screven, Ga., shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged as a private of that organization on January 23, 1921: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, or allowances shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

NORMAN HILDEBRAND

The bill (S. 1311) for the relief of Norman Hildebrand was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $185 to

Norman Hildebrand, chief radioman, United States Navy, for the loss of uniforms and other personal effects as a result of a fire in the living quarters of the radioman in charge at the naval radio station, David, Republic of Panama, on December 29, 1935: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

REIMBURSEMENT FOR FIRE LOSSES AT EUREKA, CALIF.

The bill (S. 1315) to provide for the reimbursement of certain enlisted men and former enlisted men of the Navy for the value of personal effects lost by fire at the naval radio station, Eureka, Calif., on January 17, 1930, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum or sums, amounting in the aggregate not to exceed $266, as may be required by the Secretary of the Navy to reimburse, under such regulations as he may prescribe, enlisted men or former enlisted men, of the Navy, for the value of personal effects lost as a result of a fire which destroyed a building at the naval radio station, Eureka, Calif., on January 17, 1930: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claims. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claims, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

REIMBURSEMENT FOR FIRE LOSSES AT WASHINGTON NAVY YARD

The bill (S. 1454) to provide for the reimbursement of certain enlisted men of the Navy for the value of personal effects destroyed in a fire in building no. 125, United States Navy Yard, Washington, D. C., on July 16, 1935, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $588.70, or such portion as may be necessary, to pay claims of enlisted men of the United States Navy for the value of personal effects destroyed as the result of a fire in building no. 125, United States Navy Yard, Washington, D. C., on July 16, 1935: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy shall determine the amount to be paid thereunder to each claimant: And provided further, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claims. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

J. H. RICHARDS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 179) for the relief of J. H. Richards, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 4, after the word "Treasury", to strike out "not otherwise appropriated" and insert "allocated by the President for the maintenance and operation of the Civilian Conservation Corps"; in line 7, to strike out the numerals "$10,000" and insert "$5,000"; and on page 2, at the end of the bill, to insert a proviso, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury allocated by the President for the maintenance and operation of the Civilian Conservation Corps, to J. H. Richards, of Collinsville, Ala., the sum of $5,000. The payment of such sum shall be in full settlement of all claims against the United States for damages sustained by the said J. H. Richards on account of the loss of his minor child, Evelyn Richards, who was struck and killed on September 4, 1934, near Collinsville, Ala., by an automobile in the service of the Civilian Conservation Corps: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FIELDS B. ARTHUR AND OTHERS

The bill (H. R. 1120) for the relief of Fields B. Arthur and Arthur L. Allen, copartners, Colorado Culvert & Flume Co.; Glen Haller, Kenneth Austin, A. B. Hoffman, J. W. Jones, and Lloyd Lasswell was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to settle and adjust the following claims of creditors who furnished services or supplies to E. M. Harris & Sons, Sugar City, Colo., under their contract, Als–3951, dated July 18, 1929, for the construction of the Blue Lake Road, extension no. 584, within the San Isabel National Forest, Huerfano County, Colo., and who were prevented from bringing a timely suit under the provisions of the act of August 13, 1894, as amended (33 Stat. 811), against the surety of said E. M. Harris & Sons, after their default in the performance of said contract, by the Government's failure to notify them of the final settlement date of said contract:

(1) Fields B. Arthur and Arthur L. Allen, copartners, doing business as Arthur & Allen, in a sum not exceeding $1,004.67;

(2) Colorado Culvert & Flume Co., in a sum not exceeding $596.51;

(3) Glen Haller, in a sum not exceeding $274.60;

(4) Kenneth Austin, in a sum not exceeding $110;

(5) A. B. Hoffman, in a sum not exceeding $66.35;

(6) J. W. Jones, in a sum not exceeding $43; and

(7) Lloyd Lasswell, in a sum not exceeding $22.

SEC. 2. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,090.13, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay said claims.

SEC. 3. No part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN ARMY DISBURSING OFFICERS

The bill (S. 464) for the relief of certain disbursing officers of the Army of the United States and for the settlement of individual claims approved by the War Department was announced as next in order.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, an identical bill, being House bill 2772, has passed the House and is on the Senate Calendar. I ask that the House bill may be substituted for the Senate bill and considered at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 2772) for the relief of certain disbursing officers of the Army of the United States and for the settlement of individual claims approved by the War Department was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of the following disbursing officers of the Army of the United States the amounts set opposite their names: Capt. Bigelow B. Barbee, Finance Department, $30; Maj. Stephen R. Beard, Finance Department, $30; Capt. George W. Brent, Coast Artillery, $25; Maj. Richard L. Cave, Finance Department, $64; Maj. Walter D. Dabney, Finance Department, $92.30; Maj. Edmund W. McLarren, Finance Department, $30; Capt. Leighton N. Smith, Finance Department, $45; Maj. Arthur O. Walsh, Finance Department, $25; and Capt. Hugh Whitt, Finance Department, $25, said amounts being public funds for which they are accountable and which comprise minor errors in computation of pay and allowances due former members of the Civilian Conservation Corps, who are no longer enrolled in that corps, and which amounts have been disallowed by the Comptroller General of the United States: Provided, That no part of the amounts so credited shall be later charged against any individual other than the various payees.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Capt. William H. Buechner, Tenth Infantry, the sum of $49, representing refundments of overpayments made allottees of Civilian Conservation Corps enrollees, the collection of which amount cannot be effected from the persons to whom such erroneous payments have been made: Provided, That no part of this amount shall be charged to any person other than the payees.

SEC. 3. That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of Maj. John B. Harper, Finance Department, the sum of $1,509.59, public funds for which he is accountable and which represent items disallowed by the Comptroller General of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Capt. Albert J. Leavitt, Engineer Reserve, the sum of $67.48, or so much of said sum as shall have been collected from him prior to the approval of this act, representing refundment of Government funds which were stolen from his Civilian Conservation Corps company safe on April 18–19, 1936: Provided, That no part of this amount shall be charged to any person other than the person committing said theft.

SEC. 5. That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of Capt. Richard Lee, Corps of Engineers, the sum of $583.69, public funds for which he is accountable and which were paid by him to the Memphis Packet Co. for freight shipments by water, and which amount has been disallowed by the Comptroller General of the United States.

SEC. 6. That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of Maj. Charles Lewis, Finance Department, the sum of $295.38, public funds for which he is accountable and which were paid by him on fraudulent vouchers prepared by an employee of the finance office at Fort Benjamin Harrison, Ind.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Capt. Elbert W. Martin, Field Artillery Reserve, the sum of $45.68, public funds for which he is accountable and which were destroyed by fire on the night of November 15–16, 1935, and which sum he has refunded to the United States.

SEC. 8. That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of Maj. Frank E. Parker, Finance Department, the sum of $4,449.80, public money for which he is accountable and which has been disallowed in his accounts by the Comptroller General of the United States on account of payments made to emergency nurses on duty with the Civilian Conservation Corps during the period November 1933 to August 31, 1935, in compliance with the Executive order of the President dated May 8, 1933.

SEC. 9. That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of First Lt. (now Capt.) Alexander H. Perwein, Finance Department, the sum of $2,038, public money for which he is accountable and which was paid in error to Civilian Conservation Corps enrollees on properly certified vouchers for the month of September 1933, and which amount has been disallowed in his accounts by the Comptroller General: Provided, That no part of the amount so credited shall be charged to any person other than the various payees: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Capt. C. McL. Lott, United States Marine Corps, so much of said sum as shall have been collected from him prior to the approval of this act.

SEC. 10. No part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with these claims, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, Senate bill 464 will be indefinitely postponed.

CLAIMS OF GEORGE A. HARDY AND OTHERS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 463) to settle the claims of four persons arising from first Army maneuvers, August 1935, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 2, line 2, after the numerals "1935", to insert a proviso, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to George A. Hardy the sum of $986; to Mang B. Kiechle the sum of $1,505; to John C. McLeod the sum of $667.25; and to Earl W. Zimmer the sum of $755.85, in full settlement of all claims against the United States on account of damages to private property arising out of the occupancy and use of their land by the Army in connection with the First Army maneuvers held in the vicinity of Pine Camp, N. Y., during the period August 17 to August 31, 1935: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with these claims, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I inquire if the bill has been approved by the War Department?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, not only has the bill been approved by the War Department but the War Department prepared the bill and sent it to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who introduced it. It was then referred to the Committee on Claims and approved by that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS ARISING FROM NAVAL AMMUNITION DEPOT EXPLOSION

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 713) to provide an appropriation for the payment of claims of persons who suffered property damage, death, or personal injury due to the explosion at the naval ammunition depot, Lake Denmark, N. J., July 10, 1926, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to add at the end of the bill a proviso, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $59.53 is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Comptroller General of the United States to make payment of the claim of J. Harvey Blanchard for property damage due to the explosion at the naval ammunition depot, Lake Denmark, N. CLASSIFICATION, ETC., OF COTTON

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1500) authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to provide for the classification of cotton, to furnish information on market supply, demand, location, condition, and market prices for cotton, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with an amendment, on page 1, line 4, after the word "and", to strike out "public" and insert "publish", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to collect and publish statistics of the grade and staple length of cotton", approved March 3, 1927, is amended by inserting between sections 3 and 4 thereof the following new sections:

"SEC. 3a. The Secretary of Agriculture, upon request in writing from any group of producers organized to promote the improvement of cotton who comply with such regulations as he may prescribe, is authorized and directed to determine and to make promptly available to such producers, the classification, in accordance with the official cotton standards of the United States, of any cotton produced by them. The Secretary of Agriculture is further authorized to pay the transportation charges and to furnish tags and containers for the samples of cotton submitted for classification under this section, and all samples of cotton so classified shall become the property of the Government, and the proceeds of any sales thereof after classification shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

"SEC. 3b. The Secretary of Agriculture is also authorized and directed to collect, authenticate, publish, and distribute, by telegraph, radio, mail, or otherwise, timely information on the market supply, demand, location, condition, and market prices for cotton, and to cause to be prepared regularly and distributed for posting at gins, in post offices, or in other public or conspicuous places in cotton-growing communities, information on prices for the various grades and staple lengths of cotton.

"SEC. 3c. The Secretary of Agriculture is further authorized to make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary to effectuate the purposes of this act."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this appears to be a bill of importance. I wish the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] would explain it.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have here a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture urging the passage of the bill. The previous act of Congress standardized the grades of cotton and now the staple has been standardized. There are premiums for all grades and staples above the standard, and discounts for those below the standard. The rank-and-file markets, however, have not had an opportunity to benefit from this procedure. This bill provides that whenever a group of farmers throughout the country ask for this information, they may be furnished at a nominal price the grades and staples, and, further, the Secretary of Agriculture is to issue bulletins stating the premiums in the principal markets. I think it is very essential that this be done.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD, as part of my remarks, the report of the committee on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report (No. 143), submitted by Mr. SMITH on the calendar day March 2, 1937, is as follows:

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to whom was referred the bill (S 1500) authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to provide for the classification of cotton, to furnish information on market supply, demand, location, condition, and market prices for cotton, and for other purposes, having considered the same, recommend that the bill do pass with the following amendment:

On page 1, line 4, strike out the word "public" and insert in lieu thereof the word "publish."

OBJECT OF BILL

The object of this bill is to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to provide for the classification of cotton and to authorize the Secretary to furnish timely information to cotton producers with respect to market supply, demand, location, condition, and prices for cotton.

ANALYSIS OF BILL

This bill amends the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to collect and publish statistics of the grade and staple length of cotton", which was approved on March 3, 1927, by inserting between sections 3 and 4 of the act three subsections.

The first subsection which this bill proposes to add to the act of March 3, 1927, authorizes and directs the Secretary of Agriculture, upon request in writing from any group of producers organized to promote the improvement of cotton and who comply with such regulations as he may prescribe, to determine and make promptly available to such producers the classification of any cotton produced by them. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to pay transportation charges and to furnish tags and containers for the samples of cotton submitted for classification under this subsection. The samples of cotton which are submitted for classification to the Secretary become the property of the Government, and the proceeds of any sales of such samples after classification will be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

The second subsection which this bill, if enacted, would add to the act of March 3, 1927, authorizes and directs the Secretary of Agriculture to collect, authenticate, publish, and distribute, by telegraph, radio, mail, or otherwise, timely information on the market supply, demand, location, condition, and market prices for cotton. The bill provides that this information relating to prices for the various grades and staple lengths of cotton shall be prepared regularly and distributed for posting at gins, in post offices, or in other public or conspicuous places in cotton-growing communities.

The third subsection which this bill proposes to add to the act of March 3, 1927, merely authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary to effectuate the purposes of this act.

The Secretary of Agriculture, in reporting on S. 4572, of the Seventy-fourth Congress, second session, which is identical with this bill, said that he considered this assistance to growers associated in one-variety communities to be a thoroughly desirable one. He said that studies recently made by the Department of Agriculture have shown that, for the most part, growers market their cotton without knowledge of its quality or of the prices at which equal qualities are selling at the time in the larger central markets. The studies also revealed that prices paid to growers in local markets do not, as a rule, reflect the premiums and discounts prevailing on the larger central markets, but, on the contrary, there is a definite tendency for growers on a given day and in a given market to receive about the same prices without regard to differences in the quality of their cotton. As a consequence, the Secretary said, the growers' incentives for the improvement and maintenance of quality are largely destroyed. This is manifestly not in the interest of the growers, nor is it in the interest of the general welfare of the country.

In world competition, superior quality is one of the greatest advantages which American cotton possesses. This fact has been rather clearly brought out in the experience of European spinners who have undertaken to substitute other growths. To preserve this advantage we should be seeking ways to make it worth while to growers, individually, to improve the quality of their cotton and to cooperate with each other in order to make the production of high-quality cotton general throughout the Cotton Belt. Furnishing classing and quotations services to growers who would improve the quality of the cotton they produce by participating in one-variety community organizations, in the opinion of your committee, would definitely help in this direction.

Experience which the Department of Agriculture has had with one-variety communities thus far has shown that cotton-classing and market-news services are essential to the success of these organizations. When the growers are unable to bargain for and obtain better prices for the better qualities of cotton produced, they become discouraged and tend to abandon efforts to improve quality. For these reasons and because of the dependence which is being placed in the one-variety community organization as an instrument of permanent crop improvement, it is believed that these services should be furnished to growers of cotton.

The committee was unanimous in recommending the passage of this legislation, and it earnestly solicits the favorable action of the Senate at the earliest possible date.

JOHN A. FLAGG

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 869) for the relief of John A. Flagg, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment at the end of the bill to insert a proviso, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws or any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon persons who have served in the military forces of the United States the period spent by John A. Flagg as mess sergeant, Company G, Ninth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, from March 25, 1917, to July 25, 1917, shall be included in computing the time spent by said John A. Flagg in active service in the United States Army: Provided, That no back pay, pension, bounty, benefit, or other emolument shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act, except for the period March 25, 1917, to July 25, 1917, inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAVAL RESERVE OFFICERS' TRAINING CORPS

The bill (S. 1115) to amend section 22 of the act approved March 4, 1925, entitled "An act providing for sundry matters affecting the naval service, and for other purposes", was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 22 of the act approved March 4, 1925 (43 Stat. 1276; U. S. C., title 34, sec. 821), is hereby amended by inserting, in lieu of the words "twelve hundred", at the end of the section, the words "twenty-four hundred", so that the section as amended will read:

"SEC. 22. A Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps is hereby authorized to be established and operated under such regulations as the President may prescribe, which regulations shall, so far as may be practicable, conform to the provisions of the National Defense Act approved June 3, 1916, sections 40 to 53, inclusive (39 Stat. L. 191–194), as amended by the act approved June 4, 1920, sections 33 and 34 (41 Stat. L. 776–779): Provided, That the powers conferred therein upon the Secretary of War with regard to the Reserve Officers' Training Corps are hereby conferred upon the Secretary of the Navy with regard to the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps: Provided further, That all expenditures in connection with the establishment and operation of the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps shall be specifically appropriated therefor: Provided further, That members of the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps shall be eligible for appointment as Naval Reserve officers under the same conditions as provided by law for the appointment of Naval Reserve officers from other citizens of the United States, and when so appointed shall have the same status and be entitled to the same benefits in all respects as provided by law for other members of the Naval Reserve: Provided further, That the word 'naval' wherever used in this section shall be construed to include Marine Corps: And provided further, That the total personnel of the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps shall not exceed at any one time more than 2,400."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask to have the report on this bill printed in the RECORD in connection with its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report (No. 145) submitted by Mr. WALSH on the calendar day March 2, 1937, is as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1115) to amend section 22 of the act approved March 4, 1935, entitled "An act providing for sundry matters affecting the naval service, and for other purposes", having considered the same, report favorably thereon without amendment and with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The purpose of the bill is to authorize an increase in the number of students in Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps units from 1,200 to 2,400.

The bill was introduced at the request of the Navy Department. The Department states that the bill is in accord with the program of the President. It is estimated that the additional cost to the Government will be $108,518 for the first year and that at the end of the fifth year the additional cost will stabilize at about $89,123 per annum.

The following statements contained in a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to the chairman of the committee explain the views of the Department on this measure and are hereby made a part of this report.

"The graduates of Reserve Officers' Training Corps units are the best source from which to secure Reserve officers. With the present legal limit of 1,200 students, the maximum number of graduates each year will not exceed 230, and is usually much less. The Naval Reserve can easily absorb 500 graduates annually, and in view of existing conditions it is highly desirable to increase the legal limit to 2,400. Such increase would not affect the number graduating until 4 years after the date it is authorized.

"At the present time there are units at six institutions. Should the proposed increase be authorized a survey will be made in contemplation of the establishment of additional units.

"The cost of the proposed legislation is estimated to be $108,518 for the first year, $64,529 for the second year, $95,268 for the third year, and $106,377 for the fourth year. The additional 1,200 students will then be enrolled and for the fifth and successive years the cost will stabilize at an estimated $89,123 per annum. The cost of maintaining the present enrollment of 1,200 students is stabilized at approximately $85,000 per annum."

Universities now having Reserve Officers' Training Corps units feel that these units are a distinct benefit to the students. A copy of a letter from the dean of Northwestern University to the dean of Tulane University of Louisiana on this subject is hereby made a part of this report.

FEBRUARY 11, 1937.

Dean JAMES M. ROBERT,
College of Engineering,
Tulane University of Louisiana,
New Orleans, La.

DEAR DEAN ROBERT: Due to the fact that we were in the throes of registration for the second semester, your letter has remained unanswered. Northwestern University is one of the five institutions in the country having a Naval Reserve unit. We think very highly of our unit and they have done an excellent work here on this campus. Approximately one-fourth of the students enrolled are engineering students. This is an elective subject with us and students may elect it for 2 or 4 years. Under separate cover I am sending you one of our announcements and on pages 38–39 you will find the descriptive matter concerning naval science and tactics.

The Government has always sent us highly polished gentlemen, and they have an unusually good influence over the students enrolled in the course. A student may come to my office for conference and even though he is not wearing a uniform, I can instantly recognize that he is in the naval science unit by his unusual degree of politeness. The courses offered during the 4 years I consider very fine, and the summer cruises are to be highly commended. On page 24 you will see our requirements for summer work. A student who is on a Navy cruise gets credit in this way on his summer work requirement for the time thus spent.

Answering your question as to whether our unit has been a distinct benefit to our men, I say unqualifiedly yes, and I say so without any reservations whatsoever. I think if the Government is contemplating assigning such a unit at Tulane University, the institution could consider itself fortunate.

It is, of course, impossible for me to say whether you should have such a unit at Tulane, for I am not acquainted with your local conditions. I will show Commander Washburn, who is now in his second year here, and ask him to write you more fully as to how the unit operates.

If I can be of any further assistance to you in this matter, please do not hesitate to call on me. I hope I will have the pleasure again, as formerly, to have our annual visit together at the S. P. E. E. meeting in Cambridge.

Yours sincerely,

WM. C. BAUER, Dean.

The committee is of the opinion that the enactment of this bill will further the national defense by providing additional Reserve officers for the Navy in case of mobilization and that it will be of benefit to the students to be enrolled.

The following information concerning Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps units is hereby made a part of this report:

ALLOCATION OF UNITS

The present enrollment of 1,200 Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps students authorized by law is equally allocated to the following universities: Yale University, Harvard University, Northwestern University, Georgia School of Technology, University of California, and University of Washington.

MISSION OF NAVAL RESERVE OFFICERS' TRAINING CORPS

The mission of the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps is to provide systematic training and instruction in essential naval subjects at civil educational institutions in order to further the plan for national defense.

SCOPE AS AN AGENCY TO FURTHER NATIONAL DEFENSE

The Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps will accomplish its mission as an agency to further the plan for national defense by—

(a) Qualification of selected students for appointment as ensigns in the Naval Reserve or second lieutenants in the Marine Corps Reserve, thus assisting in meeting the demands for increased commissioned personnel in time of national emergency.

(b) Education of students who fail to complete the entire course so that they will be of value to the Navy in time of national emergency in proportion to the time spent in the corps.

(c) Increased dissemination of knowledge concerning the Navy and Marine Corps, their purpose, ideals, achievements, and handicaps, thereby gaining and holding increased public interest in the maintenance of adequate naval defense.

ORGANIZATION OF THE NAVAL RESERVE OFFICERS' TRAINING CORPS

The Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps is composed of all naval training units established in civil educational institutions of the United States. A unit is the total student enrollment in the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps at any one civil educational institution. As outlined in the basic law authorizing the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps, units are established at universities and colleges granting degrees, including State universities and those State institutions that are required by law to provide instruction in military tactics (land-grant colleges).

REQUIREMENTS FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF UNITS

The following requirements must be met prior to the establishment of a Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps unit at a civil educational institution:

(a) There must be insured to the unit an enrollment in the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps freshman class (first year of the basic course) of at least 50 physically fit male students who are citizens of the United States, not less than 14 years of age, and whose qualifications and intentions will reasonably insure their completion of the 4-year naval course.

(b) The authorities of the institution shall agree to establish and maintain the courses in naval science and tactics prescribed by the Bureau of Navigation.

(c) An officer of the Regular Navy shall be detailed as professor of naval science and tactics and may be assisted by additional officers of the Regular Navy and an officer of the regular Marine Corps so detailed.

OUTLINE OF COURSES

The course in naval science and tactics which all members of the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps are required to pursue is a regular elective 4-year course at the university in which a unit is established. The subjects to be covered in the course are prescribed by the Navy Department, Bureau of Navigation. The 4-year course consists of the basic course (taken by freshmen and sophomores) and the advanced course (taken by juniors and seniors). Satisfactory completion of the basic course is a prerequisite for enrollment in the advanced course.

To qualify for a commission in the Naval or Marine Corps Reserve, Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps students are required during their enrollment in the advanced course to make a cruise of from 2 to 3 weeks.

Following is an outline of the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps course given at the University of California, which is representative of the courses given at all Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps units:

SUBJECTS COVERED IN COURSE

Class	Hours per week
	First semester	Second semester
Freshman	4	4
Sophomore	4	4
Junior	5	5
Senior	5	5

NOTE.—Included in the above is 1 hour of drill, required of all classes.

The subjects assigned each class are as given in the following outline:

Class and subjects assigned

Freshman: United States naval history, ordnance, navigation, seamanship, communications.

Sophomore: Seamanship, navigation, ordnance, gunnery.

Junior: Seamanship and naval leadership, navigation, gunnery, engineering, tactics and naval history, communications.

Senior: Administration, navigation, aviation, electricity, military law.

PERSONNEL ON DUTY AT NAVAL RESERVE OFFICERS' TRAINING CORPS UNITS

There are six line officers of the Regular Navy usually of the following ranks: One captain, one commander, two lieutenant commanders, two lieutenants.

The captain in charge of the unit is the professor of naval science and tactics. He is a member of the faculty of the university while on this duty, and is head of the department of naval science and tactics. The officers on his staff are associate professors or assistant professors of naval science and tactics, and are members of the faculty of the university.

Four retired chief petty officers, members of the Fleet Naval Reserve, are on active duty with each unit, acting as assistants to the instructors and performing necessary duties in connection with the operation of the unit and upkeep of material.

ASSIGNMENT OF NAVAL R. O. T. C. STUDENTS UPON GRADUATION

Upon graduation, all students who have successfully completed the 4-year course in naval science and tactics, if recommended by the professor of naval science and tactics and if physically qualified, are given commissions as ensigns in the Naval Reserve or the Marine Corps Reserve. A certain number are commissioned in the regular Marine Corps and in the Supply Corps of the Regular Navy. Statistics show that practically all these university students who complete the course in naval science and tactics, join either the Regular Navy or the Naval Reserve Force.

EMOLUMENTS RECEIVED BY NAVAL R. O. T. C. STUDENTS

The required uniforms and uniform equipment and the educational equipment (including textbooks) used by the students are furnished by the Government.

Emoluments	Advanced-course students (juniors and seniors)	Basic-course students (freshmen and sophomores)
Uniforms, while at institution	1 every 2 years	1 every 2 years.
Commutation of subsistence at institution	611 days, at 25 cents per day, $152.75 (total for 21 months in advanced course).	None.
Subsistence on cruise	24 days, at 50 cents per day, $12.	24 days, at 50 cents per day, $12.
Pay on cruise	24 days, at 70 cents per day, $16.80.	None.
Transportation to and from ships for cruise	Average, $9.43	Average, $9.43.
Medical treatment on cruise	All necessary
Ammunition and supplies and equipment, used by students and instructors at institution and on cruise.	At institution and on cruise.	At institution and on cruise.

NOTE.—Totaling the emoluments received by naval R. O. T. C. students (including one cruise in the basic course), the cost of putting a student through the N. R. O. T. C. course is $292.41.

JAMES MEAGHER

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1272) for the relief of James Meagher, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 5, after the name "Meagher", to insert "deceased", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers James Meagher, deceased, who was a member of Company B, Eighty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private on August 12, 1863: Provided, That no back pay, compensation, bounty, benefit, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I find here strong recommendations against this measure by the Secretary of War and Major General Conley, as well as others. I should be glad to have an explanation of the bill from the Senator reporting it.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, of course the Senator fully understands that the Secretary of War makes his recommendations on the records before him. I will briefly state what the facts are. The record is a long one.

This man Meagher was a soldier of the Union Army in the War between the States. He was in many of the heaviest engagements during the war. At the Battle of Gettysburg he was severely wounded. He was sent to a hospital, and, according to the evidence which has been submitted, he was ill for a long time. When he left the hospital he could not get back to his command. He walked on crutches. He had no way to go other than to walk, so the evidence shows. The members of his company finally were used as replacement troops. The company was decimated, having been almost destroyed in the Battle of Gettysburg.

After the war this man was disabled for the remainder of his life. He died in 1889, leaving a widow. The widow died, and the only surviving relative is a daughter, now 73 years of age. The bill confers no benefits upon her; but for a long time she has been trying to have the charge of desertion removed from the record of her father.

He was an outstanding soldier. Many letters written to his wife while he was in the Army have been placed in the record.

The passage of the bill means nothing to the Government from a financial standpoint, and no purpose is served except that this 73-year-old daughter wishes the record cleared up; and under all the circumstances, I believe most sincerely that it ought to be done.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill relative to the military record of James Meagher, deceased."

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1435) to create a board of shorthand reporting, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1436) providing for the employment of skilled shorthand reporting in the executive branch of the Government was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ARMY DAY

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 5) to recognize April 6 of each year as Army Day was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That April 6 of each year be recognized by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America as Army Day, and that the President of the United States be requested, as Commander in Chief, to order military units throughout the United States to assist civic bodies in appropriate celebration to such extent as he may deem advisable; to issue a proclamation each year declaring April 6 as Army Day, and in such proclamations to invite the Governors of the various States to issue Army Day proclamations: Provided, That in the event April 6 falls on Sunday, the following Monday shall be recognized as Army Day.

TURTLE BAY AND TURTLE BAYOU, TEX.

The bill (H. R. 3689) declaring Turtle Bay and Turtle Bayou, Chambers County, Tex., to be nonnavigable waterways was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Turtle Bay and Turtle Bayou, in Chambers County, in the State of Texas, be, and the same are hereby, declared to be nonnavigable waterways within the meaning of the Constitution and laws of the United States of America.

SEC. 2. That the existing project for Turtle Bayou, Tex., authorized by the Rivers and Harbors Act approved June 25, 1910, be, and the same is hereby, abandoned.

SEC. 3. That the right of Congress to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That concludes the consideration of bills on the calendar.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICES AND POST ROADS

Mr. HAYDEN, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters, which were ordered to be placed on the Executive Calendar.

POSTMASTER, OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am directed by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to report favorably the nomination of Joseph S. Morris to be postmaster at Oklahoma City, Okla., and I invite the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] to it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement in regard to this appointment, and then I shall ask for immediate consideration of the nomination.

Mr. Morris is the Assistant Postmaster of the United States Senate and has been for 4 years. He has been nominated postmaster at Oklahoma City, Okla. This is the so-called Victory Day, and it would be quite a tribute to Mr. Morris if his nomination could be confirmed today. Mr. Morris is eminently qualified to discharge the duties of his new office, having had 4 years' experience in the Senate post office.

I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the nomination.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the nomination is confirmed.

If there be no further reports of committees, the calendar of nominations is in order.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc, except the last nomination on the list, that of J. Fred Wilson to be postmaster at Clay, W. Va. At the request of the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT], who is absent on account of illness, I request that this nomination be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc with the exception of the nomination of J. Fred Wilson to be postmaster at Clay, W. Va.

That completes the Executive Calendar.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate stand adjourned until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 8, 1937, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MARCH 4, 1937

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

In the sacred moments of this hush, O Lord, hear our prayer and consider our desire; hearken unto us for Thy truth's and righteousness' sake. Here we would pause and find in Thee strength, courage, and usefulness; here may we be transformed by the renewing of our minds, that we may prove what is that good, acceptable, and perfect will of God. Teach us Thy statutes and let love be found to disarm all fears and bring to this chosen assemblage wisdom and encouragement. We pray Thee, our Father, to cleanse us in thought and feeling; sanctify all mistakes and failures and recover us out of every ill. Grant us such a sense of Thy nearness that our hearts shall overflow with boundless good will and service for our country. In the Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. J. Res. 51. Joint resolution to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war", approved August 31, 1935, as amended.

EDWARD T. TAYLOR

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, 28 years ago at noon today, the dean of the Colorado delegation, Hon. EDWARD THOMAS TAYLOR, entered this House as a Member of the Sixty-first Congress. Continuously since March 4, 1909, year after year, regardless of the vicissitudes of politics, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] has served as a Representative from the Centennial State. He has been elected 15 times successively. For the first three terms he was Congressman at large from our State; but, beginning with the Sixty-fourth Congress, after Colorado was redistricted, he came here as Representative of the Fourth Congressional District, which comprises the entire western half of Colorado.

Mr. TAYLOR has served under six Presidents: President Taft, President Wilson, President Harding, President Coolidge, President Hoover, and now under President Franklin D. Roosevelt. He has served under eight Speakers of this House: Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois; Champ Clark, of Missouri; Frederick H. Gillett, of Massachusetts; Nicholas Longworth, of Ohio; John N. Garner, of Texas; Henry T. Rainey, of Illinois; Joseph W. Byrns, of Tennessee; and under our present Speaker, WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, of Alabama. With assurance I can say that Mr. TAYLOR has enjoyed, during his long service here, the confidence, the respect, and the esteem of every one of the Presidents under whom he has served, regardless of politics, and of every one of the Speakers who have presided over this House and of all his fellow Members of the House. [Applause.]

When the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] first became a Member of the House, he was appointed to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation. Within a few years thereafter he became chairman of that committee, a committee very important to the West. He was also a member of the Committee on Public Lands, being vice chairman of that committee for several years. In 1919 when a select committee of 12 was appointed to formulate the Budget system under which we are now operating, he served as a member of that committee.

The report of the special committee was adopted and the membership of the Appropriations Committee of the House was enlarged from 21 to 35. April 18, 1921, Mr. TAYLOR was appointed to the enlarged committee. In accepting this appointment to the Appropriations Committee, which is an "exclusive" committee, he was obliged, of course, to relinquish his membership on the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation and on the Committee on the Public Lands, on which he had served with such distinction.

Mr. TAYLOR has now, since the lamented death of the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Buchanan, served longer on the great Appropriations Committee than any other present member thereof. For several years he has been the chairman of the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee having charge of appropriations for the Interior Department. Mr. TAYLOR in his service as a member of this subcommittee has been invaluable to that portion of the country which we, who come from there, refer to as "the West." With all due respect to those gentlemen who live as far from Washington toward the setting sun as Buffalo and Chicago, we mean by "the West" that part of the country beyond what the pioneers called "the Big River", namely, the Missouri.

But Mr. TAYLOR's vision is not now and never has been circumscribed or his horizon limited to that part of the Nation from which he comes. He has now as full and intimate information concerning the fiscal affairs of the Nation as a whole as any other Member of the House, barring none.

Mr. TAYLOR has also been highly honored by the Democratic Party, of which he is a distinguished member. He organized the bureau of naturalized citizens at the Democratic national headquarters at Chicago during the campaign of 1916, and conducted the party campaign throughout the 24 Western States to secure the votes of foreign-born citizens of 46 different nationalities and languages. He was the chairman of the Democratic caucus of the House of Representatives during the Seventy-fourth Congress. During the 8 months of the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress in 1935, Mr. TAYLOR was designated by Majority Leader BANKHEAD to act, during Mr. BANKHEAD's illness, as majority leader.

Only 8 other men of the approximately 10,000 who have been elected to the House in the last 150 years have been elected 15 successive times—Kelly, Bingham, and Butler, of Pennsylvania; Gillette, of Massachusetts; Pou, of North Carolina; Haugen, of Iowa; Sabath, of Illinois; and Vice President Garner, of Texas.

The distinguished dean of the House and of the Illinois delegation [Mr. SABATH], who has completed 30 years of continuous service, and who is today beginning his sixteenth consecutive term, is the only present Member who has served in the House of Representatives longer than has Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado.

Among those who were first sworn in as Members of the House on March 4, 1909, were our former Speaker, Joseph W. Byrnes, of Tennessee, whose untimely death we all deplore and whose memory we all cherish with affection. Also among that group was my colleague the gentleman who so ably represents the Third Congressional District of Colorado, the Honorable JOHN A. MARTIN. But Mr. MARTIN, after serving in the Sixty-first and Sixty-second Congresses (1909–13), voluntarily retired, and, after an interval of 20 years, was elected to the Seventy-third and has been reelected to the Seventy-fourth and Seventy-fifth Congresses. So Mr. TAYLOR is the only one of those who 28 years ago today entered the House as new Members who has served continuously in the House ever since.

Mr. TAYLOR's service in the Congress has been the sequel to long and distinguished public service in the State of Colorado. For 52 years he has been in public life. Born in Illinois, reared on a farm in Illinois and on a stock ranch in Kansas, he moved to Colorado in 1881. He was the first principal of the high school in Leadville, Colo., in 1881 and 1882. Thereafter he attended the University of Michigan and was graduated from the law department there in 1884. Returning to Leadville, he began the practice of law. In the fall of 1884, he was elected county superintendent of schools in Lake County. In 1885–86 he was deputy district attorney in the district, including Lake County. In 1887 he removed to Glenwood Springs, in Garfield County, which has ever since been his home.

From 1887 to 1889, Mr. TAYLOR served as district attorney of the ninth judicial district of Colorado; and, while so serving, adjudicated the water rights of practically all of northwestern Colorado. He was a member of the State senate for three terms—1896 to 1908—was president pro tempore of the State senate for one term, and during those 12 years of service was the author of some 40 statutes and 5 amendments to the constitution of our State. In the meantime he served five terms as city attorney of Glenwood Springs and two terms as county attorney for Garfield County. In short, when Mr. TAYLOR came to the Congress 28 years ago his name was already a household word throughout our State.

During the last 28 years, in the Fourth Congressional District of Colorado and in our State as a whole, large majorities have frequently been given to Republican candidates for local offices, for State offices, for United States Senators, and for President. The people of Colorado are highly intelligent, are much interested in public affairs, and keep themselves well informed as to the conduct and capacity of their elective officers. Long since, they learned how to "scratch their ballots" and to do so with discrimination. It is, therefore, highly significant that, regularly every 2 years, for the past 28 years, even in elections that proved to be Republican landslides in Colorado, "ED" TAYLOR—as he is affectionately known throughout our State—running on the Democratic ticket, has been reelected to Congress by ever-increasing pluralities. He is indeed the representative not only of the Democrats but of all the people of western Colorado.

I believe I may fairly say that Mr. TAYLOR stands preeminent in Colorado, not only in the length and distinction of his public service but also, and even more, in the affectionate regard and esteem of the people of our State and of the West. I am sure there is no man now or at any time who has ever won a higher place.

Mr. Speaker, I know all other Members of the House share the feeling that we of the Colorado delegation have for our distinguished and much beloved dean. [Applause.]

INTERNATIONAL LABOR OFFICE

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House Joint Resolution 252, to aid in defraying the expenses of the International Labor Office incident to holding its Technical Tripartite Textile Conference.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

House Joint Resolution 252

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $15,000 to aid in defraying the extraordinary expenses of the International Labor Office incident to holding its Technical Tripartite Textile Conference in Washington, D. C., in April 1937: Provided, That $10,000 of this appropriation shall be available for contribution for such purposes to the International Labor Organization, and not to exceed $5,000 shall be available for expenditure by the Secretary of Labor for expenses incident to holding such conference in Washington, including personal services in the District of Columbia, communication services, stenographic and other services by contract if deemed necessary without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5), local transportation, stationery, supplies, repairs and alterations, and such other expenses as the Secretary of Labor may deem necessary.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, in the period between 1923 and 1929, when most of the industries in America were in more than normal, healthy condition, the textile industry of America was having considerable difficulty, through labor and otherwise. At the request of a number of Members of the House and the Senate, as well as Governors of States and representatives of both the industry and workers, a list of which I have with me but shall not call because of the desire to save time, the President of the United States appointed a Cabinet committee to make a survey of the situation with reference to the textile industry. This committee consisted of the Secretary of Commerce, Secretary of State, Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Labor. Subcommittees were appointed, which held conferences and amassed a great deal of testimony. On the 21st of August they filed with the President, and he transmitted to the House of Representatives a document consisting of 154 pages, which I hold in my hand and which gives a lot of general information about the textile industry and their problems. As a part of this report made by that Cabinet committee I read this brief paragraph:

In connection with the study of long-time problems, attention is called to the fact that an investigation of the textile situation throughout the world is under consideration by the International Labor Office. This should be furthered by American aid and cooperation.

As a result of that recommendation by the Cabinet committee, the President requested the American representatives to the International Labor Conference at Geneva to suggest that a conference be held which would direct its special attention to the textile industry and that this conference be held in America.

America produces between 40 and 50 percent of all the textiles of the world, and it is very proper this sick industry in America should have a conference in order to try and find out if anything can be done to help it. The International Labor Office, with which the American Government cooperates and to which we make annual appropriations, has called a meeting to be held in Washington during April.

The purpose of the appropriation of $15,000 as called for by this resolution is to assist in defraying the added cost of holding this meeting in Washington rather than at the seat of the International Labor Office, which is Geneva, Switzerland. May I say if the conference were held at Geneva, Switzerland, where it would ordinarily be held except for this invitation which has been extended and accepted, we would undoubtedly send American representatives, and the cost of that is estimated to be between seven and eight thousand dollars; so the cost of holding this meeting in Washington rather than in Switzerland calls for a net additional outlay of between seven and eight thousand dollars.

This conference will be attended by the representatives of the leading textile-producing nations of the world. There will be present representatives of the textile manufacturers, the governments, as well as workers, in an effort to have a round-table discussion in order to try to find ways and means, if possible, to help this industry.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. May I ask the gentleman if this conference will assist the textile industry of this country in one respect? If the gentleman will go uptown here he will see in one of the large department stores two large windows decorated with foreign merchandise which, in my judgment, should be manufactured by the textile industry of this country. If this conference will do anything to make the foreign manufacturers pay the standard of wages set by the American manufacturers, and if it will do something that will in some way hold the best markets of the world for America, then the conference might be of some consequence. But if it is going to permit these big stores in Washington and elsewhere to advertise products of foreign manufacturers, then I question very seriously if the conference will be of much advantage to the American textile industry and American labor.

Mr. WOODRUM. It is hoped the conference will do a great many things to help the American textile industry. I think the gentleman may be assured the American representatives attending that conference, who will be chosen by the textile manufacturers of this country, will see to it that their interests are protected.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, we are at this time paying out for the expenses of the International Labor Union and our connections with it upward of $200,000. It is true that this particular resolution involves only an additional expense of between seven and eight thousand dollars. The meat of the entire situation is that we are going up against a crowd that has lower standards of living, lower standards of working conditions, and a larger number of hours of labor than our people have been educated to have. The desire of all of these other nations is to bring down the standards of the American workingman and the American people generally.

Let me say to you that ever since this Administration started, when we have gone into an international conference of any character, the United States of America has got the worst of it. It is probably true we cannot get away from this expenditure, because of the manner in which we have authorized the President to go ahead and make these arrangements, but the thing I am fearful of, and the only thing I expect out of it, unless a different attitude is pursued, is that when we come out of this conference our textile industry, our working people, and the country as a whole will be worse off than they were before.

I hope that on this occasion we will have representation that will protect the American industry and the American worker and not lead us into the kind of situations that we have been so far led into in these international conferences by this administration. Nowhere has there been any advantage going to this country or to labor or to industry as a result of this International Labor Union. They have a large statistical organization, and that is about all there is to it.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. PLUMLEY. May I inquire whether the gentleman is informed as to whether Japan is going to take part in this conference?

Mr. TABER. I was advised day before yesterday, I think, in the afternoon, that Japan had finally decided to participate in the conference, but, of course, nothing can be expected in the way of Japan improving her working hours or her wages in such a way that her textile workers and her textile industry would be on a par with the wages received by the workers in American industries.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I think, probably, the gentleman will agree with me that Japan will take part in this conference, because she has done very well in every other conference she has had with American representatives.

Mr. TABER. That is undoubtedly so.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. In this conference, will some consideration be given to the question of child labor?

Mr. TABER. There is supposed to be some consideration given to that.

Mr. REED of New York. At the present time the Japanese are working children before they are even through nursing, in competition with labor over here.

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman have any idea that by this conference a tendency will be developed to bring up the textile industry in foreign countries at least to the scale that we have established in America, or will the tendency be to bring down American labor standards to those of foreign countries?

Mr. TABER. As I understand, there will be a dozen foreign nations in the conference, and we will be in it also. Our representatives should take the position, and maintain it, of trying to bring up the foreign industries and foreign labor to a level with American labor; but every one of the dozen other countries will be trying, probably, to beat down our conditions to their own level.

Mr. RICH. If the gentleman will permit one further question, if they do not agree to maintain the standard that is set by America, would it not be the wise thing for the American delegates to insist that we maintain a tariff that will equalize the difference between the cost of manufacture in foreign countries and in our own country, so that the American wage earner will have this advantage, at least, as a result of this conference?

Mr. TABER. That is what the tariff is for.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Is it not a historical fact that the United States has never lost a war and has never won a conference?

Mr. TABER. I guess that is about it.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the joint resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL, 1938

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5232) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill may continue throughout the day, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER] and one-half by myself.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether those of us who are opposed to this bill will be given ample time to express ourselves upon it?

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, of course, I cannot determine what the gentleman considers ample time; but I may say to him that last year when this bill was under consideration, every man opposed to the bill who requested time was given time, and it will be my purpose to follow the same policy this year.

Mr. BIERMANN. I will say to the gentleman that some of us who were opposed to the bill did not have the time we thought we ought to have, but my point is that in general debate on a bill of this importance, before the chairman or the ranking minority member parcels out time to Members who want to speak on other subjects, all those who want to speak on the bill should be taken care of. I would like to have 30 minutes on this bill.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I cannot promise the gentleman 30 minutes. He has not, before this moment, asked for a minute of time. I shall do the best I can to give him as much as possible, but I cannot ignore requests previously made for one now being made for the first time.

Mr. BIERMANN. Should a Member ask the chairman of a committee for time before the bill comes into the House?

Mr. UMSTEAD. That is the custom, as I understand it, and for 4 days I have been receiving requests, and I have been wondering why the gentleman did not make application. In fact, I have reserved him 15 minutes of time without his ever asking for it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I regret to say that I did not hear the gentleman say how much time he proposed to allow in the way of debate on the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. UMSTEAD. General debate is to run through the day, and we hope to conclude general debate today and take the bill up under the 5-minute rule tomorrow.

Mr. FISH. Does the gentleman propose to limit debate to the bill?

Mr. UMSTEAD. Today?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. UMSTEAD. No; that was not my request.

Mr. FISH. Assuming those in the House want to speak on the bill, will they be given preferred treatment?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I refer the gentlemen, and others on his side, to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER].

Mr. FISH. I have plenty of time, but I was thinking about others in the House. I think other Members in the House agree that this is a highly important bill, and if Members want to be heard they ought to be heard at this time in preference to those who want to speak on some other subject.

Mr. UMSTEAD. I shall say what I said to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BIERMANN] a moment ago, that I do not understand that the chairman of a committee or the ranking member of a committee can ignore requests for time under general debate, and those who desire to speak on the bill, in my judgment, should have made requests for time before today.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman surely agrees that those who want to speak on the bill ought to be afforded opportunity to speak on it.

Mr. UMSTEAD. I certainly do.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5232.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5232, the naval appropriation bill, 1938, with Mr. BLAND in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes.

As chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations for the Navy Department, I present for the consideration of the House the annual naval appropriation bill for the next fiscal year. The Appropriations Committee does not determine the Government's naval policy. This policy is determined by Congress and the administration in power. When Congress has expressed its will through legislation, and when the Government's naval policy has been determined upon pursuant thereto by the administration then in power, it is the task of our committee, as I understand it, to determine when and in what amount sums shall be made available to effectuate that policy, consistent with good business judgment and ordinary common sense. I also consider it the duty of our committee to see to it that no greater sums are recommended than appear to be reasonably necessary under the facts and circumstances existing at the time of the consideration of the estimates effectually to carry out the will of Congress.

We of the committee believe that the amounts recommended in this bill will be sufficient to continue the building program, maintain the necessary personnel of officers and enlisted men, adequately support the various shore stations and departments, proceed with replacements and expansion under the aviation program, and further, that by economical and proper use of the funds carried in this bill, the Navy will have sufficient money to carry on effectively and efficiently its entire establishment. We have seriously endeavored by the reductions recommended and the suggestions which we have made to impress upon the Department and the service the necessity of a businesslike and economical operation and the improvement and efficiency of the Naval Establishment.

It manifestly would be impossible for me to take the time today to discuss with those of you who are interested all of the details incident to the appropriations carried in the bill. I shall, therefore, undertake to call your attention to a few of the most important items now before us for consideration.

In the first place, I call attention to the fact that appropriations thus far provided for the Navy Department for the current fiscal year are in the sum of $528,102,532. The Budget estimates for 1938 amount to $562,425,709. This bill now before us carries appropriations totaling $526,555,428, of which $10,000,000 is an item heretofore appropriated by the Congress, and is reappropriated in this bill, which makes the new money carried in this bill $516,555,428; or, expressed in another way, your committee, after careful consideration of the items in the Budget, has made reductions totaling $35,870,281 below the Budget, and $1,547,104 below the sum of current appropriations.

At the outset, permit me to say that every item in this bill is related to the policy heretofore established of building the Navy of this country to the strength permitted under the London and Washington Treaties before those treaties expired.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. Not now. I shall be glad to later.

Not one item in this bill is carried for any purpose other than that which is considered to be necessary to obtain the objective of a treaty navy. Those treaties have expired, but the present policy of this Government, and the estimates upon which this bill was prepared, proceed on the same basis as if those treaties were now in operation, and as if they had not heretofore expired.

The things which contribute largely to the cost of a navy are the construction and commissioning of new ships, the aviation program, increase of personnel, both enlisted men and officers, increase in the Naval Reserve, and the accompanying expansion and proper support of all of the shore establishments. In considering this bill I ask you to bear in mind that your committee, regardless of its diligence and its efforts to eliminate all unnecessary expenditures, was controlled very largely by existing law with reference to most of the items in the bill.

You will find on pages 3, 4, and 5 of the report I have presented, a detailed statement of all the reductions made by our committee. Before going into those items I wish to call your attention, particularly those of you who oppose naval appropriations, to the fact that the time to make your fight is when authorizing legislation is before the Congress for consideration. At the last session of Congress laws were passed which added tremendously to the total cost of the Naval Establishment. Annual- and sick-leave laws which were passed added approximately $10,000,000 to the annual cost of the Naval Establishment.

Projects authorized here, yonder, and everywhere throughout the United States carry with them when estimates come to us to make them effective the necessity of appropriating money to carry out the will of Congress. So those of you who come here today and fight and oppose naval appropriations I ask you, where were you when the bills were passed authorizing the appropriations?

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. Not now. I shall be glad to later.

Mr. BIERMANN. The gentleman asked a question.

Mr. UMSTEAD. If the question hits the gentleman, I shall be glad to yield later, but not now.

In the consideration of estimates our committee is confronted with mandates of the Congress and the time to consider the cost of this project or of that project is when it is before the Congress for authorization.

Last week when the Treasury-Post Office appropriation bill was before the House a point of order was made against a provision in that bill, which was sustained by the Chair—and I am not discussing the merits of it—which will add to the cost of the Naval Establishment, apart from the Marine Corps, $2,401,250 by resuming the payments of gratuities to enlisted men upon reenlistment.

If you will follow the items as I take them up, I shall undertake to explain to you the reasons for the committee's action with respect to the items in this bill.

We were confronted with a request which called for the expenditure of $451,380, occasioned by a plan to take out of their normal uses, one transport and two cargo ships for a period of 6 weeks for the purpose of employing them in connection with a landing exercise—a joint exercise to be engaged in by the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps. We did not feel that sufficient evidence was presented to the committee to justify such a large expenditure, and therefore the committee is recommending that the added expense be not allowed.

Another item with which we were confronted was a request coming from the Budget and the Department for the recommissioning of the Pyro. The Navy has two munition ships, one the Nitro, now in commission, and the other the Pyro, which has been in a decommissioned status for about 12 years. The evidence before us indicated it would cost approximately $500,000 to recommission the Pyro and put it in a state where it could be used for the transportation of ammunition. A few years ago the Department was given money with which to decentralize the storage of ammunition throughout the United States. That program has been largely completed. Your committee took the view that at the present time there was not sufficient need for the recommissioning of the Pyro to justify the expenditure which I have indicated. It was stated to our committee that the Pyro is now maintained in a fair condition. We are of the opinion that in an emergency this vessel easily could be recommissioned within a period of 30 days.

The question of the Naval Reserve presents a far-reaching and very important subject. I think those of us who believe that we should have a navy in this country recognize that in an hour of emergency a proper and well-trained Naval Reserve would have tremendous value. However, the field is so wide and the demands are so great that your committee, although recognizing the value and usefulness of the Reserve, has taken the position that it ought not be developed too rapidly, and we therefore have undertaken to hold it down in keeping with what we believe to be good common sense and a reasonable degree of progress in the various divisions of the Reserve each year.

The appropriation act for the current fiscal year allows $7,868,000 for this component. The Budget this year proposed $9,880,000. We reduced this amount by a total of $610,091, and allowed an increase of $1,430,054; but in fairness to the Reserve I should say that most of the increase is consumed by the aviation cadet program.

I desire to call your attention especially to three other items in connection with the Reserve. One of them deals with the issuance of uniforms to the Reserve. Heretofore the uniforms have been issued out of the clothing and small-stores fund. We were requested this year by the Budget to include $250,000 for this item for the first time. We felt, after carefully considering the evidence, that the capital of the clothing and small-stores fund is still sufficient to enable it to supply the necessary clothing to reservists for the next fiscal year; and we, therefore, disallowed the item.

Another item which was presented to us, not for the first time, although a part of it, as we recommend it to you, will be for the first time—and I am sure many of the Members will be interested in it. For a number of years we have been requested to appropriate funds for the training of the Merchant Marine Reserve. We were asked this year for sufficient funds to give training to 400 officers and 500 men. We felt it unwise to grant this request, but we did believe it to be good policy to allow sufficient funds to permit the training of 100 merchant marine officers, and have a report presented to us a year from now as to the progress and results of such a program. We then would be in a position to determine to what extent it may be desirable to proceed with this new phase, from an appropriation standpoint, of the Reserve branch of the Navy.

We were confronted with another request: To provide for training an additional number of college students, outside of the presently authorized naval R. O. T. C. Your committee did not feel that there is now in existence sufficient legislative authority to justify such action and we, therefore, disallowed it and have not recommended that item.

Next we come to the Bureau of Engineering. Your committee carefully considered all of the estimates under this Bureau, because the Bureau of Engineering is in charge of a very important branch of the naval service. We have allowed the Bureau of Engineering an increase of $3,396,500. We decreased the amounts requested by $1,061,300. It should be stated in explanation of the estimates and figures I am giving you that these additional amounts of money in some instances replace nonrecurring items which appear in appropriations for the current fiscal year. In such cases it does not mean that the amounts proposed are additional sums over and above the total of appropriations made this year for a particular department or branch.

A considerable portion of the increase recommended under the Bureau has relation to experiments and tests, and in that connection I wish to read from a paragraph on page 9 of the committee's report.

It may be stated that the bill makes available under this and other heads a total of $7,424,241 for research, experiments, and tests, apart from $390,000 it is proposed to be made available of "Replacement, Navy", funds for test boilers for navy yards engaged in new construction."

I shall make no attempt now to allocate the entire sum provided for experiments and research in this bill. Besides engineering, $3,328,500 is included under the Bureau of Aeronautics, $516,000 under the Bureau of Ordnance, and $763,000 under the Bureau of Construction and Repair. In this connection I also desire to say that the experimental and research field is wide open; but, at the same time, based upon the total amount of money the Navy is now costing this Government, it appeared to the committee that it was necessary to be liberal with this item, because such expenditures look to better defense preparation in many directions and in many fields.

Under Ordnance and Ordnance Stores we did not allow the total amount requested but we have allowed a substantial increase. We decreased the amount requested by the Bureau of Ordnance by $1,595,200; and your committee felt that it was fully justified in making this decrease. I call attention to the fact that whereas formerly it was the policy of the Department to purchase all of its ammunition out of the appropriation "Ordnance and ordnance stores", under the present policy the cost of ammunition for each new vessel commissioned is paid out of funds provided for "Increase of the Navy" or "Replacements, Navy", and not out of the annual maintenance and operation fund of the Bureau of Ordnance. This means a considerable amount of money, because every vessel, as I understand it, which goes into commission has placed upon it as part of its initial cost one and one-half times the magazine capacity of that vessel. Therefore, although we are not permitting the Bureau of Ordnance all of the funds requested by it, at the same time, by reason of the ammunition policy with respect to new vessels, we are proposing, in our judgment, a very liberal appropriation.

A few years ago—in 1916, to be exact—the Navy Department constructed at South Charleston, W. Va., a tremendous so-called armor plant. The Department spent on grounds, buildings, equipment, and machinery, approximately $25,000,000. The plant was first started in 1916, or rather, plans for it—just before we entered the World War. It was completed during the war. At the end of the war the Government had actually manufactured at South Charleston certain kinds of projectiles and started to manufacture a certain amount of armor. A number of projectiles were manufactured there, and other ordnance fittings, but no armor, if I am advised correctly.

In 1922 the plant was closed. Its machinery, its equipment, its tools—part of which have been removed—in the main still remain in the plant. This establishment presented a problem to your committee, and I am calling it to the attention of Congress and particularly to the attention of the Committee on Naval Affairs for their very serious consideration. We are now having to keep in a state of repair a tremendous number of buildings and a rather large quantity of machinery. The Department is now renting 117 houses to citizens of South Charleston at a rental which is not commensurate, I understand, with rentals prevailing in the community, and there are a great many other problems connected with the equipment and the plant. As I say, we are confronted every year with the necessity of spending money for the repair and maintenance of this establishment; and it is the opinion of the committee that some disposition ought to be made of the plant in South Charleston, or some definite policy determined upon for our future guidance.

We were confronted with a request for an increase of 108 medical officers. Your committee, after considering the request, and in view of the fact there are now in the Naval Establishment 815 naval officers, felt that an increase of 108 in 1 year should not be allowed. We now have, as I said, 815, and they request an increase of 108. Your committee felt such an increase was all out of proportion to orderly procedure, and we therefore have provided for one-third of the increase requested by the Budget and the Department.

Mr. Chairman, I wish now briefly to discuss the matter of enlisted personnel. It was estimated 3 years ago that the number of enlisted men which the Naval Establishment would require for its proper operation after it reaches treaty strength would be 111,010 men. At the end of the fiscal year 1937 there will be in the Naval Establishment 100,000 enlisted men.

We were requested in this bill to provide for an average of 103,000 men during the fiscal year 1938, which would mean an additional 6,000 men during that fiscal year. This would mean, of course, at the end of 1938 there would be 106,000 enlisted men, leaving only 5,010 of the number originally stated as being the necessary number for a Navy of treaty proportions. Your committee felt that the Department was planning to approach the limit too rapidly and we reduced the proposed increase by 1,000, and, therefore, are providing for an average additional number during the fiscal year 1938 not of 3,000 but 2,500.

I now call attention to the item of travel of naval personnel. This question gave your committee considerable trouble. The policy of the Navy—and, I am told, of several other Government departments—is not to furnish travel on a cost basis but on a mileage basis. I became interested in the question and sought all of the information available about it. The legislative committee, as I understand, has heretofore given to this question serious consideration. According to the testimony before our committee, it appears that over a span of years mileage and actual expenses about equalize in the matter of reimbursement, and it would make very little difference in the ultimate cost to the Government, even if the system were changed to an actual cost basis. However that may be, I submit to the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs the importance of further consideration of this matter, and I submit to the Members of Congress that throughout the whole Government structure today and every day there are literally thousands of Government employees traveling both on an actual cost basis and on a per-diem basis, while some others travel on a mileage basis. I throw out the suggestion here and now that somehow in this great Government structure there should be and could be developed a uniform system of travel allowance throughout all of the various agencies of the Government.

We were requested to make an addition to the capital of the naval supply account fund in the sum of $6,000,000. The naval supply account fund is a fund which handles all of the purchases of supplies in use by more than one bureau of the Navy Department. They have as capital now $69,168,000. They do an annual business of 137 percent of their capital. In other words, the capital turns over or revolves at the rate of 137 percent each year. Your committee took the position that as a matter of ordinary common sense and business judgment a concern turning over annually only 137 percent of its capital had sufficient capital; therefore, we have disallowed the additional $6,000,000 requested for this purpose. However, we have added $5,000,000 to the capital of the naval supply account fund for an entirely different purpose, which is explained on page 14 of the report I have presented. This addition deals with the subject of the accumulation of a reserve supply of strategic war minerals, provision for which has been carried in the annual appropriation bills for the Navy Department, as presented to the House, for the last 2 years. I shall no longer dwell on that proposition, because it is adequately covered in the report itself.

With reference to the question of fuel and transportation, the efficient clerk of our committee obtained some figures from the Department which clearly demonstrated that the estimates of the Department were badly in error as to the quantity of fuel oil that would be consumed, if the past were any criterion.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 30 minutes.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mr. Chairman, any surplus that is left over from the fuel and transportation appropriations, of course, is blanketed back into the Treasury, but the committee took the view it was useless year after year to appropriate from $600,000 to $1,300,000 more for fuel and transportation than the reasonable needs of the Navy would require. We, therefore, have made a reduction in this item of an amount in excess of $800,000.

I shall not dwell at great length on the subject of public works, because the items are set out on pages 15 and 16 of the report, and the objects for which the funds are to be expended may be found there by anyone interested in any of the items. We did not grant all of the items requested under public works. We feel that we have acted wisely with view to proceeding in an orderly manner with the performance of the most necessary public-works items before us for consideration.

Mr. Chairman, I shall first touch upon a project which I know some Members of the House are particularly interested in. The proposition was brought up last year just prior to the closing of Congress. I refer to the naval air station at Alameda. Last year Congress passed an act authorizing the Navy Department to build at Alameda, Calif., a naval air station, and authorized the Government to take over from the city of Alameda, free and clear of all encumbrances, 929 acres, described by metes and bounds.

It appears that since that time, by Executive order, a field known as Benton Field has been transferred from the War Department to the Navy Department. The Benton Field is adjacent to the Alameda property and embraces approximately 1,050 acres of land. The plan placed before your committee by the Navy Department contemplated the use of the Alameda land and also the use of 454 acres of the Benton Field area. Your committee has included in this bill an item of $1,000,000 to comply with the terms of the Alameda authorization bill, and $364,000 of additional funds for various expenses other bureaus will be required to bear in the event the property is acquired and its development is proceeded with. Your committee felt, the time it considered this item, that the city of Alameda could not deliver this property to the Federal Government free and clear of all incumbrances. However, despite that point of view, we have provided the funds to enable development to go ahead in case procurement should be consummated as contemplated by law, prior to December 31, 1939, the expiring date under the authorizing act.

I understand the language of the authorizing act to mean what it says, and I further am of the opinion, and am anxious to make it a part of the RECORD, that not a dollar of this money can be lawfully expended by the Navy Department on the Alameda project until two things happen: First, until the town of Alameda can and does deliver this property to the Federal Government, as the authorizing act provided, free and clear of all encumbrances; and, second, that it cannot spend a dollar of this money on the 454 acres, or any other area of the Benton Field property, until the Congress has authorized and made it lawful for the Navy Department to spend it. I have discussed this matter with the chairman of the legislative committee and I am of the opinion that he agrees with me in what I have said.

Another matter, public-works project, that was presented to us relates to a model testing basin. An act was passed last May 6 authorizing the Department to construct a ship model testing plant. This is a matter that has been under discussion for many years in the Department and it is considered to be a very necessary thing.

In the beginning, I looked upon its need with a great deal of doubt. Last year the Senate made provision for it when the bill went from the House to the Senate, and when the conferees met, your conferees would not agree that this item should remain in the bill. We had not been satisfied as to its necessity or as to the reasonableness of its cost, as explained by the Navy Department. Your committee now takes the view, after having heard the evidence presented with reference to the necessity and its value to the Naval Establishment, and to commercial activities engaged in shipping and coastwise trade and the development of the merchant marine, that there is ample justification for a modern ship model basin and that it should be constructed; but we turned thumbs down on the proposition submitted by the Department and the Budget, which would permit the purchase of 100 acres of land 15 miles out of Washington and pay for it $654 an acre, and, starting from the beginning, construct an entirely new plant. Therefore we have provided $2,500,000, instead of $3,500,000 as requested by the Department, and are requiring that it be constructed on Government-owned property.

We believe the Navy has sufficient property and an ideal location down at Bellevue, D. C., now owned by the Government and partly occupied by the Naval Experimental Laboratory, and that the new model basin can be constructed there without the necessity of power plants and a great many other buildings and facilities necessary for the operation of a model testing basin if constructed on a track by itself. We are proposing, also, one other restriction. Your committee took the view that at Langley Field there is ample provision now for testing airplanes. We, therefore, eliminated from this item all matters dealing with aeronautics, which appeared to be in duplication of facilities now maintained by the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics down at Langley Field.

Mr. Chairman, we are confronted with a request to spend $1,000,000 in the enlargement of Bancroft Hall at the Naval Academy, and this item brings to the consideration of every Member of Congress a very important matter. It involves a question which ultimately may affect the cost of the retired list. It affects directly the number of men that ought to be sent to Annapolis, and it also affects directly the conditions existing so far as the number of line officers is concerned.

Your committee did not grant this request, and I am delighted to see members of the legislative Committee on Naval Affairs present. I have discussed this with some of the members of that committee, as well as with other Members of the House. We did not wish to say at this time that the number of appointments to the Naval Academy should, this next year, be limited to three, but it is my personal opinion—and I am not speaking for the committee now—that next year, unless some other solution of the officer problem be found, we shall be compelled to reduce the number of appointments to the Naval Academy to three rather than maintain it at four, as it now is. I shall not take the time, Mr. Chairman, to go into the details of the necessity for this action, except to say that the present authorized line-officer strength of the Navy is 6,531. That number was fixed in the act of July 22, 1935, and it was indicated at that time that it was the expectation to be able to arrive at that number by 1945. There were 6,257 line officers on the active list on September 30, 1936. Normal attrition is estimated at 2.5 percent.

Applied to the total authorized strength, that would represent an annual loss of 163 officers, while there will be an annually available inflow, on the basis of four appointments, of as many as 500 ensigns. Selection does not help the situation materially when it is considered that the passed-over lieutenants, junior grade, and lieutenants—and 72 percent of the authorized strength is in grades below lieutenant commander, are not separated from the Navy, but are permitted to be carried as additional numbers—the lieutenants until they have completed 21 years of service, and the lieutenants, junior grade, until they have had 14 years of service. The matter is further complicated by the introduction of the aviation cadet, who has proven that a solution has been found for supplying a large bulk of the needed flying-officer material. It is very doubtful if the Congress would be willing to forsake this arrangement and revert exclusively to getting aviation-officer material from Annapolis. These facts and considerations should be convincing that there is urgent need for further legislative consideration of the Navy's line officer situation, and raise a serious doubt as to the need or wisdom of continuing with four appointments to the Naval Academy. They constitute additional justification for the committee's refusal to recommend an addition to the dormitory facilities at the Naval Academy at this time.

Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes more.

On page 19 of the report there appears a discussion touching a floating drydock. In 1935, Congress authorized the construction of a large floating drydock. The intention was to build it on the Pacific coast and to use it in the Pacific. Its authorized cost was $10,000,000, including all accessories. The Department, with Budget consent, appeared before the subcommittee on deficiencies and obtained an appropriation of $10,000,000. This past year, in 1936, bids were asked for. They were opened and the lowest bid was in excess of $16,000,000 and the highest one in excess of $21,000,000.

Manifestly it was impossible for the Navy to build the drydock within the authorized amount. I discussed the matter with the chairman of the full committee, and your Subcommittee on Naval Appropriations has reappropriated the $10,000,000 which had been appropriated for the floating drydock and has applied it to the cost of "Pay of the Navy", and hence the paper reduction of $10,000,000 to which I have previously called attention. Before the Navy Department can proceed further with the construction of such a drydock, it will be necessary for the Department to go before the legislative committee and request new authority for spending more than double the original amount the Department had estimated the drydock would cost.

Under the head of aviation, permit me to say that the bill is written in the figures and language of the Budget recommendations. There are many who believe that aviation has come to be one of the most important branches of our national defense.

Certainly no member of your subcommittee has a contrary view. We have provided in the bill for 1938, $29,186,000 for the purchase of new planes, which is $1,800,000, as I recall it, in excess of the sum allowed for that item for this year. With that money the Navy Department will purchase 251 replacement planes, 104 additional program planes, 42 Reserve planes, and 2 lighter-than-air ships, and will also be able to employ additional civilian inspection personnel. The Navy now has in use 970 so-called program planes, and there are 892 planes on order, making a total of 1,862 planes that we should have by the end of 1938. I might say in this connection that the delivery of planes, up until this time, has been somewhat slow. The Navy Department, however, anticipates that the deliveries will be made in due course and they do not consider it reasonable to anticipate any unexpected difficulties in connection with the delivery of the planes on order. It was estimated 2 years ago that 1,910 airplanes would be commensurate with a treaty navy.

We are working toward that number as rapidly as conditions will permit. We have allowed in this bill the full amount requested for the increased cost of maintenance and repair, and I call attention to the fact that you cannot keep adding additional planes to the number now in use without also providing for an additional annually recurring expense of maintenance, operation, and repair.

On pages 20 and 21 of the report will be found a statement with reference to a limitation proposed to be placed upon the manufacture of airplanes and engines at the Naval Aircraft Factory at Philadelphia. This limitation was carried in the bill last year. It was stricken out in conference. I say to you frankly that it does not express my personal views on the subject. However, a majority of your committee felt that this restriction should again be included, and it is, therefore, a part of this bill.

As to the Marine Corps estimates, we have allowed practically everything requested, and I believe that the total reduction in the Marine Corps estimates aggregate about $143,000. In passing, permit me to say that the Marine Corps, in the estimate and judgment of the subcommittee, still maintains, justly, its reputation for efficiency and effectiveness.

I now come to the largest item in the bill, "Replacement, Navy—New ship construction." Last year your subcommittee recommended $168,500,000 for this purpose, and that amount was appropriated by the Congress. This year the Budget recommends $157,000,000. We were told by the officials of the Navy Department that on June 30 of this year there would be a carry-over into the fiscal year of 1938 of $56,500,000. The Navy Department also estimated that the maximum amount they expected to spend during the current fiscal year for ship construction would be $180,700,000. Therefore, your committee has allowed an additional $130,000,000, which, added to the carry-over of $56,500,000, makes a total of $186,500,000, which is $5,800,000 more than the Navy expects to spend during the present fiscal year. In other words, do not understand that by that reduction the ship-construction program heretofore decided upon by the Congress and the administration will be in any wise impeded or retarded; but your committee felt that it should not provide more money for the Navy Department for any particular purpose than the Department, upon its own statement and evidence, could reasonably expect to need during the fiscal year for which the appropriation is being made.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I should prefer not to, just now.

This amount will be employed to continue the construction of 81 of the vessels that are now being built. Since the close of the fiscal year 1932 provision has been made for the construction of 106 vessels. Of this number 20 have been completed and 86 are still in the building stage.

In addition to carrying on the construction program underway, we have provided, in keeping with the policy of obtaining a treaty Navy by 1941, funds for beginning the construction of eight additional destroyers and four additional submarines, which, if we continue to adhere to the provisions of the Washington and London treaties, will leave, then, to be constructed approximately 15 destroyers and four submarines.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that concludes what I wish to say at this time touching the major items with which your committee was called upon to deal. There is a matter of relatively minor importance upon which I should like to say a word before concluding.

Under two headings in this bill we were asked to appropriate as much as $1,800 each for the purchase of new automobiles. Your committee, after considering the matter, fixed upon a maximum of $1,300. Our reasons for so doing are as follows——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. UMSTEAD] has again expired.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Under the present policy of purchasing automobiles, the Navy Department, as too do other Government agencies, buys cars at very favorable prices. I cannot give you the figures in dollars and cents. In addition to that, the maximum amounts we fix that may be paid for cars do not include the trade-in value of a car on the purchase of a new one. I respectfully submit to those of you in this House who believe in economy and are always talking economy that this is one thing the committee did that ought to appeal to you. We feel that under our limitation of $1,300, plus the trade-in value of the car, plus about a $300 favorable Government allowance, a car thus purchased will be about in the $1,700 or $1,800 class. I, for one, believe that a $1,800 automobile is good enough for any department of the Government or any official to use when it is being paid for by public taxation. We therefore have written a $1,300 maximum into our bill, and I took the liberty of calling our action to the attention of the full committee of the Appropriations Committee in the hope that we should make some impression upon the entire Government structure.

Mr. Chairman, I have taken much longer than I intended to discuss some of the main items in this bill. Before concluding my remarks about the provisions of the bill I should be failing to do not only what I wish to do, but should do, if I failed to take this opportunity to express to each member of the subcommittee my thanks for the conscientious manner in which each of them endeavored to assist in the preparation of this bill.

I also wish to pay tribute to the efficiency and diligence of Mr. John Pugh, who sits at my left, clerk to the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Navy. His capacity, his tireless energy, his knowledge of the Naval Establishment, his uniform courtesy and kindness commands the respect and admiration not only of the members of our subcommittee but all those who deal with him. [Applause.]

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. The gentleman in discussing the items passed over an item on page 16 providing for an appropriation for the navy yard at Mare Island. I wonder if the gentleman would explain how that got in the bill.

Mr. UMSTEAD. During the last Congress there was authorized the construction at Mare Island of a graving dock at a maximum cost of $3,500,000. The committee last year allowed $150,000 for the preparation of plans, the removal of sewer pipes, and other necessary preliminary work. This year the committee felt that the work should continue, and we therefore recommend $500,000 additional funds in order that this project might be continued.

Mr. MAGNUSON. May I ask the gentleman if this item was recommended by any part of the Naval Establishment?

Mr. UMSTEAD. It was not, to the subcommittee. It has already been approved by the Navy Department and the Congress. It was not included in the estimates which came from the Budget.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Is it not a fact that the additional $500,000 is the action of the subcommittee itself without recommendation?

Mr. UMSTEAD. In a sense, yes; although, as I stated, the project has been authorized by Congress.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Then may I ask the gentleman whether or not the Department recommended, in relation to the general subject of drydocks, a preference for a floating drydock, and the sum of $10,000,000, in preference to the Mare Island dock?

Mr. UMSTEAD. It did not. The question of building a floating drydock was not before our committee at all, except by way of reappropriating money, which we did.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am very much interested if the gentleman has any views he would want to express as to the condition of the auxiliary fleet? While I realize that probably an authorization must be made before the Subcommittee on Appropriations can act, I feel if the gentleman has any views on the condition of our auxiliary fleet I should be anxious to hear them, and I am sure other Members of the House would be anxious to hear them.

Mr. UMSTEAD. I am not prepared to give the information requested by the gentleman for the reason that it has been before our committee only by way of isolated and collateral statements. That subject, of course, should, of necessity, be dealt with by the naval legislative committee. I have no detailed information upon which to base any opinion about it.

Mr. McCORMACK. The reason I framed my question in the manner I did was because I appreciated the fact that the gentleman probably was in that position, that the first action will have to be taken by the legislative committee; but if the gentleman has any personal views, or information, or opinions on that important matter as distinguished from his position as chairman of the subcommittee, I know it would be very interesting and a powerful contribution. My understanding is that our auxiliary fleet is in rather bad condition.

Mr. UMSTEAD. I thank the gentleman for his observations. The only information that I should be willing now to give to the House is that the Chief of Naval Operations has expressed to our committee that our auxiliary vessels are in bad condition in many instances, and that some action should be taken; but I have no information further than his general statement.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I should like to ask the gentleman several questions from notes I jotted down while he was talking. I noticed that on several occasions the gentleman referred, as I recall his words, to a treaty navy. For my part I should like to know if it is the policy of the United States Government in building our fleet to adhere to treaties which other nations no longer adhere to.

Mr. UMSTEAD. It would appear from the gentleman's question that he did not exactly understand my statement. I made no statement and do not now make any statement undertaking to say to the gentleman or to the Congress what the future naval policy of the United States may or may not be; but I do say to the gentleman that the appropriation items in this bill are made with the objective of developing a treaty navy as contemplated by the Vinson-Trammell Act; and at the time of the passage of that act both the London and Washington Treaties were in existence and operative.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. UMSTEAD. Certainly.

Mr. PHILLIPS. If I recall the gentleman's remarks correctly, he referred to the possible necessity of further legislation before money could be appropriated properly to set up the R. O. T. C. asked by the Navy Department. This is a subject in which I am interested, and I am wondering if the gentleman could not expand on it a little.

Mr. UMSTEAD. I shall be glad to, briefly. The present naval R. O. T. C. law, if I recall correctly, limits the number of R. O. T. C. students to 1,200. The Department now desires to exceed that number in a rather roundabout way, and the committee takes the view that additional legislation will be necessary before we shall have any authority to expand the number by way of appropriations.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. On page 22 of the report appears the item of $150,074,000 for 81 vessels building and heretofore initially appropriated for. Among the items are two battleships. Has the gentleman any information as to how much of the $150,000,000 will be expended on the construction of the two battleships?

Mr. UMSTEAD. Approximately $15,179,000.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. For both ships?

Mr. UMSTEAD. During 1938, the duration of this bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. What will be the ultimate cost of construction of these two ships?

Mr. UMSTEAD. $60,173,000 each.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. When will this sum have been expended by the Government?

Mr. UMSTEAD. It is estimated that it will require approximately 4 years to complete them.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. In answer to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. PHILLIPS], the gentleman from North Carolina stated that the objective was a treaty-sized navy, if I understood the gentleman correctly.

Mr. UMSTEAD. That is correct.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I rise to ask what other reason there is for what I consider a very, very large appropriation, what other basis is there?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I realize, of course, that I could not answer within any reasonable time the gentleman's question because I am of the opinion that he does not believe in any great measure of national defense. The object of this bill, whether you express it in terms of a treaty navy or otherwise, is to provide for the United States and the people who live therein an adequate national defense. [Applause.]

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I do.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is making a very informative address. I ask unanimous consent that he may be permitted to yield himself such additional time as he may require to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. In view of what the gentleman has just said, I want him to know that I stand for adequate national defense. The difference between the gentleman and myself is in what I consider unnecessarily large expenditures.

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yielded to the gentleman for the purpose of asking a question. I hope to be able to yield to him time in his own right to make a speech.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. PHILLIPS. As I recall it, the gentleman stated that the Navy was unable to expend all of the money appropriated last year. I do not want to make a speech; I want only to ask a question. I am interested in a large Navy, but I cannot understand why the Navy cannot expend the money we appropriate for building a large Navy.

Mr. UMSTEAD. That is a long and somewhat involved subject. There are many things that must be taken into consideration in determining how money may be spent properly and wisely for building up the Navy.

I do not have the time now to go into all of that, but I should like to refer the gentleman to Admiral Land's statement before the committee dealing with matters affecting delay in the construction program.

Mr. DELANEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DELANEY. On page 10 of the committee report, in discussing the Charleston plant, the gentleman referred to the fact we are renting houses down there at a very small rental not commensurate with prices received for private dwellings elsewhere in the vicinity. All over the country we have many establishments of the Navy, which, in the opinion of the Navy and our committee, should be disposed of or dismantled. Has the gentleman any suggestions to make along this line?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I have not. I understand that some evidence has been presented to the legislative committee on that subject. We have accumulated in the hearings considerable evidence, and I think the testimony will be of interest to the members of the legislative committee. I have no solution to offer at this time, but I believe those charged with that responsibility—and our committee is not—should find some solution.

Mr. DELANEY. I agree with the gentleman.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. What has the committee recommended for the Boston Navy Yard? That is not in my district, but many of my constituents work over there at times.

Mr. UMSTEAD. There is no specific item. I could not give the gentlewoman the total allocation for the Boston Navy Yard because that happens to be involved in lump-sum appropriations under several different bureaus in this bill, and there does not appear a break-down for the Boston Navy Yard or any particular yard.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman remember whether the appropriation for the Boston Navy Yard has been increased or decreased?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I should say it has been increased, but only to the extent of the natural and normal increase of the entire Naval Establishment.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FOCHT. May I call the gentleman's attention to a discussion in the last session of the Congress with regard to certain superdreadnaughts or battleships? I refer to two high-priced battleships.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. Was not the statement made here at the conclusion of that program we would have about 2,700 airplanes?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I do not recall such a statement being made on the floor; no.

Mr. FOCHT. That is my recollection. I notice there has been a diminution of 1,000, and I was wondering what happened to those airplanes.

Mr. UMSTEAD. I am inclined to think the gentleman is confusing Army and Navy figures.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Virginia that the gentleman is making a very informative speech this morning. As the gentleman is very familiar with the subject, I would like to have his opinion on what constitutes an adequate defense and what does he understand to be included in the word "defense" as we use it in connection with these appropriation bills? In other words, how far are we to go in defending ourselves? I would like to get the gentleman's opinion upon that matter.

Mr. UMSTEAD. I thank the gentleman for the first part of his statement, and I assume the gentleman knows that it would be utterly impossible for me to answer his question in the time left at my disposal.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. No. I am anxious to hear the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. UMSTEAD. May I refer the gentleman to a study of the various elements involved in a treaty navy, to the place and position which the United States occupies among the family of nations, and to all other matters affecting our international relationships and the necessity for a defense of our country?

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. I just wanted the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I would like to ask the gentleman just two more questions. One refers to lighter-than-air craft and the other refers to whether or not we have appropriated money to fix Bancroft Hall. I want to know if Bancroft Hall will be safe and sanitary and fully fireproof despite the fact we have not appropriated money to fix it up.

Mr. UMSTEAD. The gentleman again misunderstood my statement. I did not make the statement that we are not appropriating money to repair, maintain, and keep in excellent condition Bancroft Hall. The item that the committee recommended be not allowed is for an extension of Bancroft Hall, which has nothing to do with the maintenance of the institution.

Mr. PHILLIPS. May I ask the further question whether or not consideration has been given to lighter-than-air craft?

Mr. UMSTEAD. It was to the extent of the two ships provided for in the estimates.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. This interjection does not refer to battleships. One of the chief items of defense the gentleman may have in mind or should keep in mind is that we better preserve the credit of the Nation so that we may have funds for defense at some future time.

Mr. UMSTEAD. I am not differing with the gentleman about the preservation of the credit of our Nation. If he will take the Budget estimates and look at the amounts carried in this bill, I think he will give a little credit to us for trying to carry out that theory. [Applause.]

Mr. MAGNUSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. MAGNUSON. The gentleman will consider my questions in the light of trying to secure information and not as critical of the committe. I am interested in the question of a floating drydock. The gentleman stated that the question of a floating drydock did not come before his committee.

Mr. UMSTEAD. I stated the question of constructing the drydock did not come before our committee as such, and it did not.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Did not the Navy Department state that the matter was so urgent it was brought up before the Deficiency Committee?

Mr. UMSTEAD. That was in 1935 after Congress passed the enabling act. The Department went before the deficiency subcommittee on the basis of an emergency and secured an appropriation; yet from the spring of 1935 until the autumn of 1936 no proposal had been invited. The gentleman understands the reason it was not before our committee?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I do not understand the reason the committee took out the $10,000,000.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Because the act limited the total amount to be expended to $10,000,000 and the lowest bid submitted was $16,163,000.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Could not the Appropriation Committee recommend to the Committee on Naval Affairs the appropriation of an additional $6,000,000?

Mr. UMSTEAD. Our committee does not determine what the policy of the Naval Affairs Committee should be.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Did the gentleman's committee take into consideration the anticipated passage of neutrality legislation by the Congress in relation to the large expenditures for an increased Navy as contained in this bill?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I can answer the gentleman by saying that that matter was not considered by our committee at all, and so far as these estimates are concerned, was not considered in any of our deliberations or conclusions.

I also may say further to the gentleman that, as the gentleman knows, the legislation has not yet passed, and it is not the function of the Committee on Appropriations to consider legislation until it has been enacted by the Congress and signed by the President.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LUDLOW. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt his very able presentation of this bill, I may say that I think the gentleman knows my deep-seated conviction that the Government should not enter into competition with private business, and I note with some concern the extent to which the Navy Department has entered into the manufacture of airplanes. I know, of course, this is not a matter within the control of the gentleman's committee, because this is done pursuant to existing statutes, but I should like to ask the gentleman if he can give us information as to how many airplanes have been manufactured by the Government for the use of the Navy?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I understand 39 training planes have been delivered and 165, including the 39 already delivered, are under construction at the aircraft factory in Philadelphia.

Mr. LUDLOW. And will the gentleman tell us about the limitation carried in this bill against the manufacture of engines?

Mr. UMSTEAD. Yes. If the gentleman will read the language of the limitation, it will be clearer than any language I can now use. The limitation was included in last year's bill and was eliminated by the Senate and finally by the conferees. I stated, and will repeat, that although, generally speaking, I am in accord with the gentleman's philosophy about competition, when it comes to a question affecting the procurement of elements of national defense and all of the various phases of such defense, then I do not follow through with the gentleman on his theory of competition, and the limitation in this bill does not express my personal attitude, but represents the action of the committee.

Mr. LUDLOW. Does not the gentleman think there are private concerns that are capable of making these engines?

Mr. UMSTEAD. Yes; but I also think that although, of course, private industry is capable of making them, the United States Government would perhaps do well to have a yardstick on the cost of manufacturing airplanes so that it may know whether it is being charged too much or not. [Applause.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Does not the gentleman think that such a yardstick can be very readily available without actual manufacture by the Government?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I do not think so, and if the gentleman will read the hearings on the bill he will see from the questions propounded and the answers thereto that it is entirely possible to obtain a yardstick in the manufacture of airplanes, and I may say to the gentleman that the thing which bothers me about this matter is that unless we do this, how are we ever going to know how much we are being overcharged, even with the 10-percent profit limitation, in the large number of planes we are purchasing.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. COLDEN. May I ask the gentleman whether his committee considered the advisability of building a permanent graving dock on the coast of southern California and one at Honolulu as a substitute for the floating dock that was previously authorized?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I may say, with all courtesy and deference to my friend from California, that the committee was so busy considering the items placed before it, the aggregate of which ran into such a large sum of money, we did not consider such items as the gentleman has mentioned which were not included in the bill.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DELANEY. The gentleman has been very generous in his praise of his associates on the committee and of the secretary of his committee, and I want to pay a brief tribute to the gentleman for his very able presentation of this entire matter. I think everyone present appreciates the hard work the gentleman has undertaken and has so successfully carried out. [Applause.]

Mr. UMSTEAD. I thank the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan, and then I shall have to conclude.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not know whether this question comes within the jurisdiction of the gentleman's committee or not, but in the matter of over-aged naval vessels, of which we have approximately 213, can the gentleman tell us what efficiency they would have in defensive or offensive service and does over aged mean that they are obsolete or just over aged?

Mr. UMSTEAD. Do I understand the gentleman to refer to decommissioned vessels?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I would not say decommissioned, but vessels which are classed as over age.

Mr. UMSTEAD. I may say, in answer to that question, that some over-age vessels are still useful and there are many such vessels now in use. The truth is, and I say this partially for the benefit of my friends, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KOPPLEMANN] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BIERMANN] all vessels included in the 20 already completed and the 81 now under construction and the 12 new destroyers and submarines provided for in this bill are replacement vessels and do not add to the previous number of vessels in our floating Navy.

Mr. CRAWFORD. As I understand, there is a distinction in the classification of obsolete vessels and over-age vessels?

Mr. UMSTEAD. There is.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And those that are obsolete are not used at all?

Mr. UMSTEAD. There is quite a distinction between obsolete and over-age vessels. Over-age vessels are both so in fact and by reason of an arbitrary over age status prescribed in treaties. As to some of our vessels classified as over age, I should say no, and some of them unquestionably may be used again. A decommissioned vessel over age, if it be in fair condition and is kept up in proper repair—and we are maintaining a number in proper repair—in the event of an emergency could be recommissioned and could perform some very worthwhile and necessary functions.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I stated that I should not yield further, but I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I am very much interested in safety in the air. Can the gentleman tell me what is done with the obsolete airplanes?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I understand when they are declared to be obsolete and unsafe to fly they are not permitted to be used by any branch of the naval service.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman know whether accidents have decreased or increased, and the number of deaths?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I understand from the hearings before our committee that accidents are materially upon a decline.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UMSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Would the gentleman be willing to state, in the event of the passage of the neutrality legislation such as was passed in the Senate, that that would make unnecessary the size of the present Navy?

Mr. UMSTEAD. Of course, I am not prepared to answer that question, because I have not up until this time even had an opportunity, due to my labors in connection with this bill, to give proper consideration to the neutrality bill passed by the Senate. I am not familiar with all of its provisions.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I thank the gentleman, and I appreciate that he is a very busy working Member of this Congress.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time. [Applause.]

With the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER], I now yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

JAMES P. BUCHANAN

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, this is the twenty-fourth anniversary of the beginning of the service in Congress of the late JAMES P. BUCHANAN. I had intended to say a few words the day his death was announced, but my sense of loss was so overwhelming that I did not trust myself to undertake an expression at that time.

In my judgment, Mr. BUCHANAN was one of the great men of this generation. He was unusually well endowed with the qualities that go to make up an ideal public servant.

He had courage. I think we all agree that that is one of the most essential qualities of a good Representative. He possessed that quality to a superlative degree. He met all problems head up and unafraid.

He had ability. I think all who knew him will concede that. He always knew what it was all about.

He had honesty. If JAMES P. BUCHANAN told you he would do a thing, he might do more than he promised, but he would never do less.

He was unselfish. He had rather a brusque manner. It took a little while to learn what sort of man he was, but he had a heart as big as Texas, the State that he loved best, although he served all 48 with equal diligence.

He never sought anything for himself in the way of recognition except as an avenue for public service. The height of his ambition was to be chairman of the great committee of which he became chairman. He attained his ambition and used that position, as he conceived his duty to use it, in the interest of his country. He was intensely patriotic and loved his country, and, as near as a human being could, he thought only of his country's good.

I was very much impressed when talking to his physician on the day it became apparent that he could not meet the crisis with which he was faced. The physician told me that Mr. BUCHANAN, before the session began, had asked him about his future. The physician advised him that if he would quit his work and retire to his country home and live quietly he would probably live a number of years; but he told him that he could not do any great amount of work, and that if he persisted in his continuous efforts here in the House he probably would not last more than 2 or 3 months. After studying a moment, Mr. BUCHANAN said, "I believe I shall take my 2 months as a real man, as I have no desire to live uselessly."

That showed the real spirit of the man. It recalled to my mind a little poem by a noted columnist, Mr. W. F. Kirk. In the hours of his last illness, Kirk wrote a poem called the Ninth Inning. The last stanza of that poem, if I can repeat it correctly, is as follows:

'Twas a glorious game, from the opening bell;
Good plays, bad plays, and thrills pell-mell.
The speed of it burned my years away,
But I thank Great God that He let me play.

Words seem so futile. He was probably the best friend that I ever had in public life. He was almost like a father to me. Anything like an oration or a speech is not in order. I merely wanted to speak these few simple sentences of honest tribute to a great spirit with whom we had the privilege of serving. [Applause.]

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include certain excerpts from the opinions of the Supreme Court and certain other documents and articles to which I shall refer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss the report of the Brownlow Reorganization Committee, as it relates to the Interstate Commerce Commission, although what I have to say will apply quite as much to some of the other more important regulatory commissions or independent establishments of the Government, such as the Federal Trade Commission, the Federal Communications Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and the Federal Power Commission, to mention some of the more important ones only. I confine myself particularly to the Interstate Commerce Commission, because my membership on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House brings me into closer contact with the work of that Commission than of any of the others.

Let me say at the outset that I am a friend of reorganization and hope to be able to support the legislation reported by the Joint Committee on Organization. I may add that that hope is based upon the further hope that the joint committee will not accept some of the recommendations of the Brownlow Committee.

The Interstate Commerce Commission was the first regulatory commission. It was created by the passage of the Interstate Commerce Act in 1887—50 years ago—and the first chairman of the Commission was the distinguished author and jurist, Thomas M. Cooley, of Michigan.

The regulatory commissions have all been created by Congress and made its agents to assist it in the performance of the duty imposed upon it by the Constitution, "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." In the aggregate they cover a broad field and exercise tremendous power for weal or woe. At the same time, it should be kept in mind that they have no power, can exercise none, except that which has been expressly delegated to them by Congress.

SCOPE OF WORK OF REGULATORY COMMISSIONS

Some idea of the scope of their work may be had by a brief reference to the subjects or business over which they have jurisdiction. For example, Congress has made it the duty of the Federal Trade Commission to prevent unfair methods of competition on the part of those doing business in interstate commerce; of the Federal Communications Commission to regulate and control those engaged in the transmission of communications by wire or radio; of the Securities and Exchange Commission to regulate and control the stock exchanges and the issuance of corporate securities entering into interstate commerce; of the Federal Power Commission to regulate and control water-power projects on navigable streams and the transmission of electric energy in interstate commerce; and of the Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate the railroads of the country.

It would be hard to overstate the importance of these commissions. Every one of us, every American citizen, is directly affected by their work in his everyday life. In recognition of their importance and in order that they might be as free as possible from political and other control, Congress in creating them has given them an independent status outside of the regular departments of the Government, which are under the jurisdiction and the control of the members of the Cabinet. Up to this hour they are and always have been responsible to Congress, and to Congress alone. The Brownlow committee would change all this.

The papers last week carried stories to the effect that, in addition to the report of the committee, a confidential bill, prepared presumably by Mr. Brownlow, or under his supervision, was before the joint committee of the two Houses on reorganization, and at the same time an alleged summary of the bill was published.

It was difficult for me to get any more out of the summary than I did out of the report, and I assume that the bill, if there is one, having been prepared by Mr. Brownlow, attempts to put into legislative form the recommendations of the committee of which he was the chairman.

I see no reason why a bill of such importance and great public interest should be kept confidential, but, be that as it may, there was one statement in the story relating to the bill in the Washington Post that was especially significant. It was this:

Proposed changes were submitted by Louis Brownlow * * * and are understood to have been "casually" examined by the President—

The word "casually" being in quotation marks.

Herein lies the danger in accepting drafts of bills proposing legislation sent up from the White House as the work of the President. By the very nature of things and the multiplicity of his duties, the President can examine them "casually" only, if at all. They are often prepared, as in the case of the Brownlow committee, by someone without official responsibility, without public hearings, at least, and without practical experience in the field with which he attempts to deal.

I think it is only fair to say in this connection that the membership of the joint reorganization committee is such that we may expect it to carefully analyze any recommendation or bill submitted to it and to draft a bill of its own before recommending any to either House of Congress. The friends of the committee will be greatly disappointed if it does not do that.

RECOMMENDATION OF BROWNLOW COMMITTEE

It is impossible to get the full import and implications of the Brownlow committee report without a careful study of it; but, stated briefly, as far as its proposal relating to these regulatory commissions is concerned, it recommends that they be deprived of their independent status, placed in one or another department of the Government, and put under the control of, and made responsible to, a member of the Cabinet, a political appointee, and, through him, to the President. After that has been done, the work of the commissions is to be divided; the legislative, or quasi-legislative, part of it is to be separated from the judicial or quasi-judicial part and performed by a bureau or division, set up in the Department for that purpose, the members of the commissions proper to confine themselves in the future to the purely judicial part of the work now performed by them.

MEANS POLITICAL CONTROL

This recommendation, if carried out, means a radical change in a long-established practice of the Government and involves a question of public policy of fundamental importance. It seems to me and to others with whom I have discussed the matter, that it would change the very nature of the Interstate Commerce Commission; in fact, that it would destroy it as we have known it and as it has existed throughout the years. A former member of the Commission, testifying before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House a few days ago, gave it as his opinion that it would be better to abolish the Commission altogether than to put into effect this recommendation of the Brownlow committee.

Putting these commissions under a member of the Cabinet means political control. Can anyone imagine anything more unfortunate? It means direct and constant contact between the Executive and the commissions, which would deprive them of the independence which they now enjoy. Their work would thereby be subjected to political influence which might prove very powerful when an administration had some political policy or plan it desired to put across or when the exigencies of party politics seemed to demand it. Think of the power which an Executive would have under such circumstances to reward or punish if he saw fit to use it for that purpose.

Who would want to make a political campaign upon the issue of whether railroad rates should be lowered or raised? When one contemplates the possibilities of this proposal, he can well understand the feeling of the former member of the Interstate Commerce Commission who declared it would be better to abolish the Commission altogether.

The friends of the work of these commissions may take some encouragement from the apparent uncertainty of the Brownlow committee itself as to the wisdom of the recommendation.

The report speaks of it as a "possible solution" only. Referring to it, the report says:

> The following proposal is put forward as a possible solution of the independent-commission problem, present and future.

That language indicates that the committee itself was not certain of the wisdom of its position. It may be that upon further reflection it will withdraw the recommendation which it has made as to these commissions. It is devoutly to be hoped that it will; but if it does not, then the friends of the work which they are delegated to perform must rely upon the good judgment of the reorganization committees of the House and Senate not to report any legislation which will attempt to put the recommendation into effect.

As a practical matter, it is difficult to see how it could be worked out. I venture to say that anyone who attempts to draft legislation attempting it will not find it "simple", as the report speaks of it. But suppose it could be done, what would be the result?

In the first place, the bulk of the work of the Commission, or, in the language of the report—

> All the purely administrative or sublegislative work now done by the Commission; in short, all the work which is not essentially judicial in nature—would be done by a regular bureau or division in the Department directly responsible to the Secretary. The Commission now has an organization of about 2,000 employees, many of them experts in their field. They would all be assigned to a department, become subject to a bureau chief, and their work directed by him. It is not quite clear just what the status of the members of the Commission themselves would be. It would be some sort of a mongrel affair, a cross between complete independence which they now enjoy and responsibility to the head of the department. One thing is certain, they would not be burdened with work, as the strictly judicial part of the work of the Commission is limited. It consists largely in the trial of reparation cases.

RECOMMENDATION WOULD WEAKEN WORK OF COMMISSION AND RESULT IN DUPLICATION AND WASTE

Assuming that the work of the Commission could be divided, as recommended by the Brownlow committee, it would be bad public policy to do it. It would weaken materially the Commission's regulation of the railroads, result in duplication of effort, and a waste of time and money on the part of both the Government and of the shippers and railroads as well. The quasi-legislative work and the quasi-judicial work of the Commission overlap and merge into each other to a great extent.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Would the gentleman mind if I asked him to yield at this point?

Mr. MAPES. I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I notice the reorganization recommendation is to divide the Commission into two bodies, one a quasi-legislative body. What duties would they perform as a quasi-legislative body?

Mr. MAPES. I am coming to that. I hope to answer the question of my friend fully a little later in my remarks, I will say to the gentleman.

The fixing of rates for the future is a legislative act. An award of reparations for overcharges in the past is a judicial act. Frequently, the Commission at the same hearing considers the question of awarding reparation for overcharges in the past and fixing rates for the future. That could not be done under the set-up of the Brownlow Committee. As stated by the Supreme Court in the case of Baer Bros. v. Denver, Rio Grande R. R. Co. (233 U. S. 486):

> That the two subjects of reparation and rates may be dealt with in one order is undoubtedly true. But awarding reparation for the past and fixing rates for the future involve the determination of matters essentially different. One is in its nature private and the other public. One is made by the Commission in its quasi judicial capacity to measure past injuries sustained by a private shipper; the other, in its quasi legislative capacity, to prevent future injury to the public. But testimony showing the unreasonableness of a past rate may also furnish information on which to fix a reasonable future rate and both subjects can be, and often are, disposed of by the same order.

With a separation of the work, as the Brownlow Committee recommends, such testimony would all have to be duplicated.

DUTY OF CONGRESS TO MAKE RATES

It is the duty of Congress to fix railroad rates or, stated in another way, the fixing of rates is a legislative act. In the language of the Supreme Court in Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., Garret (231 U. S. 298, p. 305):

> It has frequently been pointed out that prescribing rates for the future is an act legislative, and not judicial in kind. It pertains broadly speaking to the legislative power. The legislature may act directly, or, in the absence of constitutional restriction, it may commit the authority to fix rates to a subordinate body.

Congress saw fit to "commit the authority to fix rates to a subordinate body", to use the language of the Court, when it created the Interstate Commerce Commission. The multiplicity of duties of Congress and the complexity of the rate-making problem, made it necessary for Congress to take such action in order to properly perform the duty imposed upon it by the Constitution. The fundamental idea underlying all commission regulation of public service corporations is that a small body of qualified experts, removed from political control, can do the job for Congress better, more continuously, and more efficiently, than Congress itself can do it.

The Interstate Commerce Commission "as the agent of Congress in making rates", quoting again the language of the Supreme Court—

> Must make them in accordance with the standards and under the limitations which Congress has prescribed (Morgan v. U. S., 298 U. S. 468).

DUTY OF COMMISSION UNIQUE

The Commission has a unique duty to perform as compared with the regular administrative agencies of the Government. It is given the Transportation Act and told to make it work. In order to do that, it must develop and have at its command a staff of experts. In its work and in the preparation of its cases, it now has the opportunity to call in its experts, to produce evidence if it sees fit to do so, to examine witnesses; in short, to make up a complete record. The Brownlow Committee would change this. It says:

> The judicial section would sit as an impartial, independent body, to make decisions affecting the public interest and private rights upon the basis of the records and findings presented to it by the administrative section.

Under that set-up the Commission would not have the opportunity of seeing the witnesses even. The most that could be said for it is that it would become just another court and would delay the final determination of contested cases to that extent, although it would be obliged to render its decisions entirely "upon the basis of the records and findings presented to it by the administrative section." It just does not seem as though that sort of thing would work with any degree of satisfaction.

The plan, if put into effect, would deprive the Commission of the power which it now has of initiating investigations upon its own motion, such as the investigation of freight charges in the United States, which it made in 1922 and which resulted in an order reducing them, and the investigation of passenger fares and surcharges, such as it made last year and which resulted in the reduction of passenger fares and the elimination of surcharges.

REASON FOR RECOMMENDATION

What is the reason for this recommendation proposing such a radical change of governmental policy? It is frankly stated to be for the purpose of bringing all the regulatory commissions and their staffs under the control of the Executive and to make them responsible to him.

The report emphasizes the alleged necessity of centralizing and enlarging the powers of the Executive from the standpoint of management, but it fails to grasp, apparently, the functions of these regulatory commissions when it recommends that they be placed under the control of and made responsible to the Executive. They exercise no executive power in the proper meaning of that term. They are agents of Congress. While the Constitution vests the executive power in the President, it vests in Congress exclusively the power to regulate commerce between the States, with foreign nations, and with the Indian tribes. The President has no power to regulate commerce. These commissions are created by Congress to assist it in the performance of its duty in this respect. Is Congress willing to place them under the control of the Executive in the performance of a duty imposed upon it by the Constitution and delegated by it to them as its agents?

What the Supreme Court said in the Humphrey's case of the Federal Trade Commission (Humphrey's Executor v. U. S., 295 U. S. 628) applies to all regulatory commissions.

The Federal Trade Commission—

The Court in that case declared—> is an administrative body created by Congress to carry into effect legislative policies embodied in the statute in accordance with the legislative standard therein prescribed, and to perform other specified duties as a legislative or as a judicial aid. Such a body cannot in any proper sense be characterized as an arm or an eye of the Executive. Its duties are performed without Executive leave and, in the contemplation of the statute, must be free from Executive control. In administering the provisions of the statute with respect of "unfair methods of competition"—that is to say, in filling in and administering the details embodied by that general standard—the Commission acts in part quasi-legislatively and in part quasi-judicially. * * * To the extent that it exercises any executive functions, as distinguished from executive power in the constitutional sense, it does so in the discharge and effectuaton of its quasi-legislative or quasi-judicial powers, or as an agency of the legislative or judicial departments of the Government.

REPORT FAILS TO GRASP TRUE FUNCTION OF COMMISSIONS

In other respects the Brownlow committee seems to fail to grasp the true function of these commissions. Throughout the section of the report dealing with them reference is made to their "policy determining powers" or functions as if they, in and of themselves, could initiate and put into effect governmental policies or could exercise policy determining functions. Of course, they cannot do any such thing.

The report at one point declares:

> They are vested with duties of administration and policy determination with respect to which they ought to be clearly and effectively responsible to the President.

At another place it says that—

> The bulk of regulatory commission work involves the application of legislative standards of conduct to concrete cases.

This declaration seems a little contradictory of the other.

A function—

It continues—

> at once discretionary and judicial and demanding, therefore, both responsibility and independence.

The report further declares that the independent commissions constitute a "headless 'fourth branch' of the Government"; that instead of calling them " 'independent' regulatory commissions" "it would be more accurate to call them 'irresponsible' regulatory commissions, for they are areas of unaccountability" and that they are "vested with duties of administrative and policy determination."

Quite the contrary is the fact. They are agents of the Congress, as I have said, without any power or authority except such as Congress has delegated to them and are at all times responsible to Congress. They make annual reports to Congress. Representatives of the Interstate Commerce Commission are constantly before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House and the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate. All legislation affecting the Commission is reported by these committees and the work of the Commission is under constant scrutiny by them. In addition to that, the Commission must appear annually before the Committee on Appropriations in support of its recommendations for funds to carry on its activities and its representatives are subjected to examination by that committee. Furthermore, the members of the commissions are dependent upon the President for reappointment and the Senate for confirmation. They may also be removed from office for neglect of duty or malfeasance in office.

In the light of these conditions, it seems wide of the mark to speak of the Interstate Commerce Commission as being irresponsible. Is no public official responsible unless he is under the control of and responsible to the Executive in the performance of his duties? Every public official is responsible to the public whom he serves and subject to the law of the land.

Mr. Landis, the able and distinguished Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, in an address only last Saturday night before the Swarthmore Club of Philadelphia, speaking of his Commission, made some observations very pertinent to this recommendation of the Brownlow committee, although I do not know whether he had it in mind at the time or had ever heard of it or not.

The Sunday New York Times in its account of his address said that—

Mr. Landis ridiculed the assumption; then quoting the words of Mr. Landis, "widely held, but seemingly far from reality" that the Commission possessed "unrestrained freedom in the pursuit of its policies."

The Times story goes on to quote Mr. Landis as follows:

"Fundamental to the very creation of administrative authority is the fact that its source is legislative", he said. "It can be destroyed or altered as easily, if not more easily, than it can be born. Its actions are under the constant scrutiny of the legislature, to which it reports annually."

"Its appropriations, the lifeblood of its being", the Times continues to quote him as saying, "are a matter of annual grant and possess no inviolability in the eyes of either the Budget or Appropriations Committee."

The issue, he stated, "is one of practicality, not of doctrine; an issue of efficient and fair dispatch of business, not of formalism as to method of procedure."

It is evident that Mr. Landis, who has had practical experience and knows whereof he speaks, has a different opinion than the members of the Brownlow committee about the responsibility and power of these commissions.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I am glad to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman is discussing a very important matter, and, frankly, one that I have not made up my mind on; so when I ask the gentleman a question, I do not want the gentleman to infer that my mind is contrary to the question I ask, because my mind is open. The independence of these commissions is very thoroughly appreciated, and the necessity of preserving them is a matter of import and worthy of most profound consideration. I realize, as the gentleman has very pointedly drawn out, the difficulty of separating the administrative from the quasi-judicial functions, and I would like to ask the gentleman if he has any views on independent commissions being made a part of some one of the established departments of government for budgetary purposes, retaining their independence in respect to the duties of the commission imposed upon them by law?

Mr. MAPES. I will say to the gentleman that would carry with it practically all of the objections, in the judgment of those who have considered the matter, that are raised to the recommendation of the Brownlow committee. It would establish a direct and constant contact between the Executive and the commissions, which would deprive them of the protection which they now enjoy because of their independent status.

A reference to the hearings before the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate in the Seventieth Congress on the confirmation of Messrs, Aitchison, Farrell, and Porter to be members of the Interstate Commerce Commission will show what the members of that committee thought about this matter and what their answer would have been to the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Commissioner Aitchison was subjected to a gruelling examination upon that occasion by the members of the committee, particularly Senator WHEELER, who was critical of the Commission because it had not been more active in the exercise of the power delegated to it to regulate telephones. Commissioner Aitchison said that Congress had not appropriated funds sufficient to make it possible for the Commission to do more than it had. Then Senator WHEELER wanted to know why the Commission had not been more vociferous in making its needs known to Congress. A general discussion was then engaged in between the Commissioner and the Senators over the provision in the Budget law which prohibits any officer or employee of any department or establishment of the Government to make a request for any appropriaion or for an increase of any item as submitted to Congress by the Bureau of the Budget through the President unless at the request of either House of Congress.

As the hearings were about to close, this colloquy took place:

Senator PITTMAN. What I am getting at is this: I am dissatisfied with the whole Commission in their failure to grasp the intent of Congress in creating the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that was that it was to be a separate, nonpartisan commission as far as possible, and I mean by that it was to be an establishment that was as independent as possible of any institution except Congress. * * * It looks to me as though the institution has conceived the idea that it is responsible to the Chief Executive rather than to Congress.

Commissioner AITCHISON. No.

Senator PITTMAN. Because you are attempting to carry out what is termed an economic policy which is contravening the law of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN.—

Who was Senator Watson, of Indiana—

I have not any doubt about this as a general principle, because this idea of economy has been so thoroughly indoctrinated that I think it has been thoroughly inculcated. Of course, they lose sight of the legislative function and that the Interstate Commerce Commission is purely an agent of Congress simply because of the inability of Congress to do it.

Commissioner AITCHISON. Yes, sir.

Senator WHEELER. But they assume that they are a branch of the executive branch of the Government rather than the legislative branch of the Government.

Senator PITTMAN. I hope that the Commission does not find anything in the statute other than that section 206 to cause them fear, because the effort of Congress was to have an independent body and not a body that was afraid of anyone.

No one ever had any doubt about the responsibility of the Commission or the advantage of its occupying an independent status, free from Executive or political control, before this report of the Brownlow committee was made.

Quoting again from the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Humphrey case:

It is charged—

The Court said, speaking of the Federal Trade Commission—with the enforcement of no policy except the policy of the law. Its duties are neither political nor executive, but predominantly quasi judicial and quasi legislative. Like the Interstate Commerce Commission, its members are called upon to exercise the trained judgment of a body of experts "appointed by law and informed by experience."

And again, said Justice McKenna, in Interstate Commerce Commission v. Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway (218 U. S. 102), the powers of the Commission are "to be exercised in the coldest neutrality."

The Supreme Court said a good many things in the opinion in the Humphrey's case which are pertinent to this discussion. Referring to the report of the committee and the debates in Congress on the bill to create the Federal Trade Commission, it said:

The report declares that one advantage which the Commission possessed over the Bureau of Corporations (an executive subdivision in the Department of Commerce which was abolished by the act) lay in the fact of its independence, and that it was essential that the Commission should not be open to the suspicion of partisan direction. The report quotes (p. 22) a statement to the committee by Senator Newlands, who reported the bill, that the tribunal should be of high character and "independent of any department of the Government—a board or commission of dignity, permanence, and ability, independent of executive authority, except in its selection, and independent in character."

The debates in both Houses demonstrate that the prevailing view was that the Commission was not to be "subject to anybody in the Government but—only to the people of the United States"; free from "political domination or control" or the "probability or possibility of such a thing"; to be "separate and apart from any existing department of the Government—not subject to the orders of the President" (Humphrey's Executor v. U. S., 295 U. S.).

Is all this to be changed; is a fundamental policy of government which has worked well for 50 years to be abandoned and one foredoomed to failure substituted in its place? I cannot believe so. [Applause.]

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, 20 years ago next April, the United States entered the World War to make the world safe for democracy and to put an end to all war. The result, of course, has been that both of these motives have become mockeries and travesties. Today the world is filled with rumors of war, and predictions are freely made that there will be another world war within a year. Nations have gone mad in arming themselves to the teeth throughout Europe.

In considering this Navy bill the question before the House of Representatives is: What is our own policy? I want to commend the chairman of the Navy Appropriations Committee because of the able and clear manner in which he discussed the pending bill, but he did not discuss the policy of the United States. What is our policy? What is our policy toward Great Britain? What is our policy toward Japan? What connection has the naval policy, if there is such a thing, with our foreign policy? After all, we, the Members of Congress, have been invested by the Constitution with the power to provide for and maintain a navy. That is our duty and our responsibility, not that of the President or the Director of the Budget. We cannot escape it. I have read the pending bill and, as far as I can find out in the short time that it has been before us, it is a fair bill and I expect to support it because I believe in adequate national defense. Just what adequate national defense is is an open question as I do not know what the policy of our country is. After hearing the gentleman from North Carolina speak for an hour and a half on the bill itself I still do not know what the American naval policy is.

In this limited time, 15 minutes, it is imposible for me to say what I have in mind regarding the present armament situation. I would like to go back, as Al Smith says, and look at the record. Under a Republican administration in 1921 and 1922 a limitation-of-naval-armament conference was called here in Washington and we reached an agreement with Great Britain, Japan, and other nations to limit capital ships over 10,000 tons on a 5–5–3 basis. I thought at that time that it was the greatest step in the direction of peace since the armistice. Today I am convinced of it. At the time the big-navy men and the militarists attacked Secretary Hughes and said he had sacrificed our Navy, that he had betrayed American interests; but, as a matter of fact, just as soon as that treaty was signed we secured for the first time in all history an equality with Great Britain on the high seas. Great Britain had always maintained the Nelsonian attitude, "Britannia rules the waves", but under the Washington Treaty of 1922 she agreed for the first time to an equality with the United States on 18 battleships and 10 battleships for Japan. Overnight all thought and talk of war between Japan and the United States disappeared. It is naval armament races that create suspicion, distrust, and hatred and eventuates in war.

In 1930, again under a Republican administration, we extended the 5–5–3 treaty to the smaller ships, to the 10,000-tonners and under, to destroyers and submarines, but now, under this administration—and it is the proper time to bring it up, for today is the fourth anniversary of the present administration, it has failed to extend these naval treaties. Whether it has blundered into it—and a blunder is often worse than a crime—it failed to extend these treaties, either the Washington Treaty or the London Treaty of 1930; and, therefore, we are launched into this mad race to build the biggest battleships at the tremendous cost of $50,000,000 per battleship. And that is not all, because we must have auxiliary ships, light cruisers, submarines, and airplanes to protect each battleship costing another $50,000,000. For what purpose? Against whom are these battleships aimed? It costs $5,000,000 annually to even maintain one battleship.

I ask now why does not the President call a conference with Great Britain and Japan, invite them to Washington or elsewhere to get them around a table and see if we cannot head off this mad race to build naval armament. What has this administration done to call the attention of Great Britain to the fact that it still owes us $4,000,000,000? For 4 years the President has been silent about the war debts. Has any protest been made to the British Government about its proposed huge increase in naval armament of $7,500,000,000 in the next 5 years? You know the answer; and yet here we are, due to the failure of these conferences under this administration launched on a huge naval program. I cannot make out from this bill, however, what the policy is. Certainly in this bill we do not match the British Navy ship by ship, and certainly by this particular bill—at least according to Japanese reports—Japan expects to have a navy equal to ours in 3 years. So we have given up the 5–5–3 ratio; we are spending more money; we are getting nowhere and have no definite policy.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. What, if anything, has this administration done toward bringing about a general disarmament?

Mr. FISH. I may say this about the President: That I admire him because he can get away with murder. [Laughter.] I admire him because he went before the country in the last election and claimed a monopoly on peace and good will in the world. At the same time, by default and mismanagement, my own party, the minority party, that ought to stand for constructive criticism, let him get away with it. So the people back home have not the faintest idea that this administration has fallen down in not extending these treaties to limit naval armaments. They do not even know that this administration is not collecting the war debts. We have been strangely silent on foreign affairs, with the result that the people back home believe what the President has told them, with his honeyed voice, that he has done so much to promote peace in the world when he has actually done very little.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I would rather not yield in the limited time at my disposal.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] asked me if any efforts had been made to call a conference. Speaking as a humble Member of the House, as an American citizen, and as a war veteran, I would like to see the President call a naval limitation-of-armament conference and have the Congress of the United States ask him to do it. Here is an amendment I would like to propose to the pending bill, but, unfortunately, it will be ruled out because it is not germane:

That the President is authorized and requested to invite such governments as he may deem necessary or expedient to send representatives to a conference at Washington or elsewhere to consider the limitation of naval armaments for the purpose of reaching an agreement on a program to limit naval armaments with special reference to the limitation of battleships, battle cruisers, light cruisers, aircraft carriers, destroyers, submarines, and aircraft.

I know and everyone else knows if I offer that amendment it will be ruled out on a point of order; so I do not propose to offer it. I would be glad to have the chairman of the committee on the Democratic side offer it. This is not a partisan issue. The amendment is here, and he may have it.

I would go further, may I say to the gentleman from Minnesota. These conferences, of course, should be separate. A naval conference should be called immediately to be held either here or elsewhere, because Japan and England have already stated—England through Mr. Chamberlain, its Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Japan through the head of its Navy Department—that they are willing to enter into such a conference right now. I could read what these governments have said in the last few days if I had time. I would go further than suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota and call another general conference to implement the Kellogg Pact. We have denounced war as an instrument of national policy, except as a matter of national defense. Why not call a conference to discuss the causes and cure of war and try to head off this mad race, both from a naval and military standpoint, and bring the people of the world to their senses? Let us have them sit around a table like reasonable men. Of course, that should be done. This administration has not done one thing in the last 4 years to lessen the likelihood of war. Still I admit the fact it is just as good politically because the people back home think the administration has, in spite of its dismal record of failures.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Do I understand the gentleman to mean by that language that the people back home are not capable of knowing what is going on in the country?

Mr. FISH. I did not mean that. I have great confidence in the people.

Mr. UMSTEAD. That is what the gentleman said.

Mr. FISH. I know what I said, and I do not change one word of it.

Mr. UMSTEAD. I just want to understand the gentleman.

Mr. FISH. The President and this administration are the greatest propagandists in the world. They claim credit for everything. The President claims credit right now for doing more for peace and good will in the world than any man in it, when as a matter of fact, he has had only one success and dozens of failures. I have not the time to go into all the failures. The only success that the administration and the President has had is in South America where there are no navies and where there is no thought of a world war. If you go over the record, consider the recognition of Soviet Russia, the Economic Conference at London, the war-debt situation, and the naval limitation of armament blunders, you will see that they are all failures.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I wonder if the gentleman is not refuting his own argument.

Mr. FISH. Please do not make a speech. Just let me have the question.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The question is this: The gentleman spoke a moment ago about the war debts having been repudiated. Does he think if a person or nation's word is not good in one instance it is good in another instance? What is the use of calling a conference?

Mr. FISH. I said this administration had not done a thing to collect the war debts. Let us see what the British Chancellor of the Exchequer had to say about the finances in Great Britain. He has a good sense of humor. On February 17 he made this statement:

> The present British Government could borrow with a clear conscience because it has restored such confidence in British finances that they are the envy of the whole world.

How did they restore their finances? By repudiating a debt of $4,000,000,000 which it owes the United States of America which this administration has made no effort to collect. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON].

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. UMSTEAD], chairman of the Subcommittee on Naval Appropriations and the other members of his committee on the splendid work they have done in reporting this naval appropriation bill. They are entitled to the thanks of the House, for by searching investigation they have brought about worth-while economies. They have presented a bill some $35,000,000 under Budget estimates and they clearly justify their position for doing so. I have examined most carefully the numerous items of this bill and have read a great deal of the hearings and the bill shall have my wholehearted support. I again congratulate the distinguished chairman and his subcommittee on their splendid work.

Mr. Chairman, the Navy of the United States at the close of the World War, in ships that had been built and in ships under construction, ranked foremost in potential naval strength among the nations of the world.

It was then that the United States, firmly believing that an example of sacrifice would stay any naval building race in the future, signed the Washington Naval Treaty of 1922, whereby the leading naval powers of the world made a solemn agreement to limit naval construction in the major categories of ships to ratios prescribed by that treaty.

I need not remind anyone that between 1922 and 1929, a period of 7 years, the normal naval building program of the United States was dormant; that during this same period of time other leading powers of the world took advantage of the situation to build up to the limiting ratios prescribed by the treaty.

This country suddenly awoke to find that some immediate steps must be taken if the United States were to maintain any standing as a world power on the sea.

The steps that were taken to rectify this condition at as early a date as was consistent with national economy and the capacities of our neglected shipbuilding facilities are also well known to you in the form of the act of March 27, 1934. That act enunciated the determination of the Congress. It translated a national policy into action.

In addition to establishing the limits of the Navy in categories and in numbers of ships, this act required that the first and each succeeding alternate vessel in each category undertaken be constructed in Government yards.

In order that all Members of the House may be thoroughly conversant with the progress being made toward carrying out the building program, I shall briefly outline for your consideration what has been done since March 4, 1933, in naval construction.

The 1933 program provided for 37 vessels—32 under the National Industrial Recovery Act and 5 under the regular naval appropriation.

The 1934 program provided for 24 vessels.

The 1935 program provided for 24 vessels.

The 1936 program provided for 20 vessels, including 2 battleships, and the bill now under consideration provides for 12 vessels. A total of 117 vessels. This building program was of benefit to every State in the Union and the act of March 27, 1934, is a continuous replacement of ships as they become old and obsolete. Their design and construction embody the latest in shipbuilding, engineering, and ordnance. It is generally considered that these ships compare favorably with similar types built abroad.

To carry out the construction of these vessels there was allocated $238,000,000 from the National Industrial Recovery Appropriation; $25,050,333, increase Navy, emergency construction; and $335,914,334 was carried in regular naval appropriation bills; $130,000,000, which is in the bill now before the House, making a total up to date of $728,964,667.

Of these 117 vessels, 35 have been delivered or commissioned, and the remaining 82 are in varying stages of completion, ranging from the appropriation stage to that of being practically completed. It was expected that the new building program—act of March 27, 1934—would bring our Navy up to the strength permitted under the then existing limitation of armament treaties and would be completed by 1942, at which time our Navy, exclusive of battleships, will be made up of modern, up-to-date ships.

This building program provided employment, direct and indirect, to between 120,000 and 180,000 men per annum, affecting approximately 600,000 and 900,000 people from a family support point of view.

That this revival of shipbuilding, together with its attendant benefits, which extend into so many fields of raw materials, industries, and trades, might possibly be short-lived cannot have been contemplated by Congress when, on June 30, 1936, it enacted the public-contracts law, commonly known as the Walsh-Healey Act.

To those who only read the headlines of our daily newspapers it must be evident that this act has been the means of threatening what appeared to be an otherwise favorable prospect. Seldom does a day go by but that a caption arrests our attention with the information that some industry refuses to bid on Navy contracts because of stipulations required in those contracts by the Walsh-Healey Act. Only the other night a cartoon appeared in the Evening Star, Washington, D. C., depicting the Secretary of Labor sitting defiantly on a division of battleships while the Secretary of the Navy and two of his admirals stand pleading, "Gimme my ships!"

By the administration of the Walsh-Healey Act there is being caused a delay in the construction of some 20 ships on account of the lack of being able to obtain steel and other necessary equipment. Eleven of these ships are being delayed on account of the inability to obtain other equipment than steel.

It is impossible that Congress ever intended that one of its laws, or the administration of any of its laws by the head of an executive department, should have the effect of paralyzing the program of national defense.

A review of the hearings on the Walsh-Healey bill before its enactment indicated that "sweatshops" persisted in some branches of industry, that child labor was on the increase, that insanitary and unsafe factories were not uncommon, and that some employers were taking advantage of the recovery in industry to force employees to labor an unreasonable number of hours per week, and not infrequently at wages incompatible with the American standard of living.

Since the N. R. A. has been declared unconstitutional, and it was therefore unlawful to regulate industry by codes, Congress felt that so far as Government business was concerned, at least, this business could be given to those firms which would agree to conform to reasonable standards of employment as regards sanitary working conditions, reasonable hours, and living wages.

The emphasis was always placed upon sweatshops.

It was provided, therefore, in the Walsh-Healey Act that no contract in excess of $10,000 for any materials, supplies, articles, or equipment should be entered into by any Government agency unless stipulations were agreed to by the contractor that he would conform to reasonable standards of employment as regards sanitary working conditions, reasonable hours, and living wages. Naturally enough the Secretary of Labor was designated to administer the act. It was assumed that the Secretary of Labor would be in a position to know better than any other executive department of the Government sweatshop conditions and what were reasonable wages for a particular industry.

However, obvious difficulties were foreseen by Congress in carrying out such broad provisions as were embodied in the act. Therefore the act contemplated that certain exemptions would be necessary from the stipulations of the act, if in fact the best interests of the Government were to be served. It therefore provided in section 6 thereof as follows:

SEC. 6. Upon a written finding by the head of the contracting agency or department that the inclusion in the proposal or contract of the representations of stipulations set forth in section 1 will seriously impair the conduct of Government business, the Secretary of Labor shall make exceptions in specific cases or otherwise when justice and the public interest will be served thereby.

It appeared to Congress that the act could be administered in such manner as would materially benefit labor and at the same time offer no obstacle to orderly Government procurement.

The act offered better hours, better wages, and sanitary working conditions to the laboring man.

The contractor, knowing the added cost, if any, in performing the contract, could add the additional costs to his bid price.

The Government was assured of being able to fill its needs because there was a provision that if the head of a department certified that the best interests of the Government would be served thereby the Secretary of Labor was, it was assumed, compelled to grant an exemption to the stipulations of the act.

As written there appeared to be nothing which could prevent its functioning.

The act became effective on September 28, 1936. Thereafter attempts were made to transact Government business as usual. In the machine-tool industry, however, the Navy Department soon met obstacles. Manufacturers were taking exception to the stipulations of the Walsh-Healey Act.

After many delays, brought about by attempts of the Navy purchasing officer to procure these tools according to the new law, it was finally determined that a request for an exemption under section 6 of the act should be requested, since manufacturers refused to bid if stipulations of the Walsh-Healey Act were to be included in their contract, and the public interests did demand the immedite procurement of the tools because they were needed at the gun factory to complete naval ordnance for new ships under construction. I am informed that after correspondence and conferences between the Secretary of Labor and the industry, a compromise was reached which finally permitted a greatly delayed procurement, though no exemption was ever granted by the Secretary of Labor.

A more disturbing situation arose in connection with the procurement of copper. On four different occasions toward the end of the calendar year 1936 the Navy went into the market in an effort to obtain copper needed for the industrial navy yards. On these occasions invitations for bids were widely advertised and in addition sent direct to all prospective bidders on the mailing list for such material.

Upon failure to receive satisfactory bids, the Navy Department addressed letters to some 50 of the prospective bidders in an effort to obtain definite reasons for their failure to bid. Various reasons were advanced, including objections to the provisions of the Walsh-Healey Act.

The Secretary of the Navy made an administrative finding of fact in regard to copper and requested that the exemption provided both by the law and the regulations be granted. The Secretary of Labor has not yet authorized exemption of the copper needed for the industrial navy yards.

The Navy Department has on several occasions been forced to make emergency purchases in order to meet the urgent needs of the yards, which purchases being made without advertising, under the regulations of the Secretary of Labor are exempt from the provisions of the Walsh-Healey Act.

No one can look with favor upon a situation forcing such procedure when Congress has provided a definite method for obtaining exemption.

While the failure of the Secretary of Labor to grant the statutory exemptions provided for places the responsibility for delaying the shipbuilding program on that office, however, this does not remedy a situation which may unnecessarily delay completion of ships urgently needed for the national defense as authorized by the Congress.

A climax was reached, however, in the attempt to procure steel for new construction.

On December 14 and 18 bids were opened for some 25,000,000 pounds of main structural steel for submarines and destroyers. Twenty-four companies responded but conditioned their bids either specifically on executing a contract free from the stipulations of the Walsh-Healey Act or in some other manner qualified their bids so as to have little doubt that these stipulations were the cause of the conditioned bids.

As a result, from the standpoint of the validity of bids alone, disregarding other factors, it would have been possible to make an award for only some 7,000,000 pounds, and this quantity only for certain plates and shapes which were not in sufficient variety to permit any orderly construction progress. The Navy, after canvassing the industry, learned that the stipulations of the Walsh-Healey Act were the insurmountable obstacles.

The problem was laid before the Secretary of Labor with an administrative finding by the Secretary of the Navy, that the inclusion of the stipulations of the Walsh-Healey Act in the contracts for steel would impair the Government interest. Section 6 of the act which I have quoted you, which provides, you will recall, that in cases of such administrative finding by a head of an executive department, the Secretary of Labor shall make exceptions.

These exceptions in the cases of these contracts for steel were requested and for a period of 2 months the impasse has not been overcome, although it is understood there have been letters and conferences between the manufacturer and the office of the Secretary of Labor. No exemptions have been granted.

Jeopardy to the national defense is but one of the grave consequences resultant from a delay in the procurement of structural steel. The construction of ships in any plant contemplates a well-coordinated flow of structural steel, together with organized employment schedules. An interruption in the flow of steel must be attended by a suspension of labor.

Reports from the various navy yards, which include Portsmouth, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Norfolk,

Charleston, S. C., Mare Island, and Bremerton, indicate that the failure to provide steel has brought or will bring these yards to the point where existing organization will be destroyed and men must be discharged or furloughed unless immediate steps are taken to provide the materials required.

Statistics from these yards indicate that as many as 5,000 men may be affected.

According to the press, there appears to have been a happy solution of the steel question in the agreement between the steel industry and organized labor affecting the 40-hour week with increased wages. It is to be hoped that this agreement will remove the obstacles now existent in the steel situation so that the Navy will be able to obtain the steel required to continue without further delay the construction of its vessels. However, this does not clear up the situation of having the Secretary of Labor to sit in veto over the procurement of all material for the Navy in excess of $10,000.

Other items of importance which the Navy has failed to obtain due to the Walsh-Healey Act include machine tools for navy yards, twine for the ropewalk, Boston, hydraulic gears for cruiser ordnance equipment, ingot copper, Diesel-driven electric generators for destroyers, refrigerating and air-conditioning machinery for submarines, and electric outlet and feeder boxes for cruisers.

From a consideration of the whole case there appears to be no question but that Congress intended to vest in the head of the contracting executive department the administrative determination as to when the Government business is being impaired. That determination having been made, the act provides that the Secretary of Labor shall make exceptions, when justice or the public interest will be served thereby.

The impasse, for the continuation of the national-defense program is due to the refusal by the Secretary of Labor, over a period of months, to grant an exception to the stipulations of the Walsh-Healey Act, and this refusal is persisted in over the certification of the Secretary of the Navy that the Government business will be impaired unless the exception is granted.

It is submitted that the plain intent of the act is that the responsibility for making the determination as when this impairment is threatened in the case of procurement lies, and should lie, with the Secretary of the Navy.

To allow any other interpretation is to permit a head of department who has no intimate knowledge of the problems of national defense to decide those problems over the head of department under whose cognizance such matters naturally fall. Carried to its logical conclusion, the Secretary of Labor may in any instance prevent procurement of any material if in the judgment of that officer the public interest as seen by that office will be better served otherwise.

It is apparent that the full authority for administering the needs of the Navy in the national defense should be vested in the Secretary of the Navy where the responsibility reposes and where the technical knowledge exists for the correct use of judgment and discretion in these matters. Such responsibility should not be divided with any other Government department or subject to the vagaries of administration of any other department which possesses neither the technical knowledge of the Navy nor the responsibility for the maintenance of that part of the national defense.

If such construction cannot be placed upon the language of the act as was the intention of Congress, the act should then be amended to place these matters solely within the administration of the Secretary of the Navy insofar as Navy business is concerned.

In conclusion, it is pertinent to ask whether the provisions of the act of March 27, 1934, which establishes the program of national defense for the Navy, is to be overridden by the administrative ruling of another head of department in effecting the provisions of the Public Contracts Act, which was primarily designed to overcome sweatshops.

Such was not and cannot have been the intent of Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, 4 weeks ago when I listened to the President's message on the Supreme Court my feelings were mingled, my reactions uncertain, and the wish which was uppermost in my mind was that I might withdraw from the heat of controversy for a few days to study quietly this momentous problem. I did this very thing. I have studied history and precedent; I have listened to the speeches made in this Chamber, and I have become convinced that the President's plan is the only practical one, and that it should be enacted now while the need for progressive legislation is so imperative.

Stripped of all propaganda, divested of untruths and half truths this issue is in reality one of conflicting principles, and it should be so treated. Unfortunately the tactics which muddied the passage of the Wheeler-Rayburn utilities bill 2 years ago and the election last November are being employed once again. Regardless of everything else, we as United States Congressmen, sworn to represent 130,000,000 American people, must wage this battle over the Supreme Court on the field of truth, principle, and economic necessity.

If we are to consider this problem dispassionately we must eliminate certain charges which have been leveled against the President and his Supreme Court measure. To say that the plan is without precedent is an absolute falsehood. Six times heretofore Presidents have injected new blood into the Supreme Court. Six times in our history Presidents confronted with problems similar to those which Franklin Roosevelt now faces have resorted to this same procedure. Furthermore, those who suggest that the plan is not constitutional are likewise deceiving the people of this country. In its fine system of checks and balances the Constitution of the United States gives Congress the power to increase the number of Supreme Court judges and gives to the President of the United States the power to nominate these judges, and the Senate in turn the power to confirm them. Franklin Roosevelt's proposals are strictly constitutional in every respect, and they neither violate the spirit nor the letter of that document. There is no sound reason for anyone to think that Roosevelt's nominees for the Supreme Court would not be just as good, just as patriotic, and just as efficient as those of Warren G. Harding, for example. Another hysterical warning, which is absolutely without foundation, is that Roosevelt seeks to become a dictator. I submit that a calm perusal of the Constitution itself will convince anyone that no President restricted by that document can ever become a dictator. In the first place, the Chief Executive must appear before the people of this country every 4 years for reelection or rejection; and in the second place, the Congress of the United States, elected by the people every 2 years, holds in its hands the right of impeachment in the event that an Executive abuses his power. You know and I know what the citizens of the United States, reared in liberty and freedom, would do at the polls to any would-be dictator. No President can ever control the Supreme Court. I have already stated that additional members to that body must be approved by Congress and the appointments of the new judges themselves must be confirmed by the Senate. I do not know how many more checks on Executive power a timorous person would want.

Recently, one of our colleagues in this House compared the President's plan to a stacked deck of cards. I take immediate exception to such an outrageous statement as this. A stacked deck denotes cheating and treachery and it is a shameful thing for a Member of this House to make such a charge against the President, who is acting strictly within his constitutional rights, whose motives are honorable, and whose plan is motivated by the deplorable condition of millions of our citizens. [Applause.]

President Roosevelt's greatest predecessors from Jefferson to Jackson, from Jackson to Lincoln, from Lincoln to Theodore Roosevelt, have all had similar difficulties in the relationship between their administrations and the Supreme Court. The best legal and political minds in our Nation are still at odds over the constitutional rights of the Supreme Court to nullify acts of Congress. The words and acts of Franklin Roosevelt in this respect are pale compared to those of his predecessors. Andrew Jackson stormed over a decision of John Marshall's as follows, "John Marshall has made a decision; now let him enforce it." That was outspoken defiance of a Supreme Court decision and yet Andrew Jackson goes down in history as one of our great patriots, and one of our greatest Presidents. Jefferson lamented that the Constitution had become a mere thing of wax in the hands of the judiciary, which they could form in any way they pleased. Abraham Lincoln, in his first inaugural address, referred to the nullifying power of the Supreme Court as a contradiction of popular government. He said that under such circumstances the people have ceased to be their own rulers, having to that extent practically resigned their Government into the hands of the Supreme Court.

Are we not foolish, however, to spend so much time discussing precedent and history? The problems of today and their relationship to the future of America are our task, and our minds should be focused on them. We must pull today's foot from yesterday's footstep. We must realize that laws are made for the living and not for the dead. It is not the duty of Government and certainly not of this Congress, merely to preserve tradition, but to make laws which will promote the general welfare of this Nation and to protect the rights of the majority of our citizens. It is not necessary for us to derive courage from acts or declarations of past Presidents. That is a contradiction of the spirit of the authors of our Constitution. Those very men were the greatest exponents of political change that the world has ever known. It is inconceivable to believe that they would deny succeeding generations the flexible political privileges which they undertook for themselves.

For four years the Roosevelt administration has endeavored to legislate for the people of America without interfering in any way with the Supreme Court. The present proposal is not an attempt to usurp judicial power, or to sap the independence of the Supreme Court. If that had been Roosevelt's ambition, it would have become apparent months ago. The present proposal is an imperative move to fulfill the promises which this administration has made to 130,000,000 American citizens. It is likewise imperative if the mandate delivered by the people last November is to be carried out.

What was that mandate? My interpretation of it is this: That 6,000,000 farmers who are tottering on the verge of bankruptcy, and were left without hope by the A. A. A. decision, expect us to ameliorate their sufferings. Five hundred thousand coal miners, and I might say many operators, are threatened with the same chaotic conditions which beset their industry in 1932 because of the Guffey coal-bill decision. Over a million railway workers expect us to give them some protection in their advancing years. This hope was dashed to the ground a few years ago because of the Supreme Court's adverse decision on the Railway Retirement Act. Over 15,000,000 industrial and clerical workers of America are at the mercy of their overlords so far as minimum wages and maximum hours are concerned. All this because the N. R. A. was declared unconstitutional. These people likewise expect us to restore to them some degree of protection and security; and last, but far from least, there are 10,000,000 unemployed men and women in America to whom this administration has promised relief, and to whom you and I held out a promise when we were campaigning for election last fall. All of these sufferers believed in us when they gave us their overwhelming support. We have got to do something about it and we must do it now. The present administration for 4 years has endeavored to complete a forward pass to the masses of our people, and many times these passes have been intercepted by the Supreme Court. Where the rights of our citizens are concerned it is proper, it is constitutional, and it is our duty to block the obstructionists. The majority of our people have as much right to representation on the Supreme Court as they do in this House of Representatives. That is the essence of popular government. Ours is supposed to be a democracy and yet during the past 2 years we have been governed by a judicial oligarchy. Ours has become a government of five men instead of one of laws. The efforts of this administration have the overwhelming confidence of our people and yet they have been repudiated by a judiciary whose actions are restricted by precedent alone.

I strongly believe in a clarifying amendment to the Constitution and so do others who support the President's plan. We believe that the President's proposal is the necessary first step, however, and that the constitutional amendment should be the second step.

Many of those who loudly cry for a constitutional amendment alone, remind me of a little poem which I learned as a boy in school:

> "Won't you come into my parlor", said the spider to the fly,
> "It's the prettiest little parlor that you ever did spy."

Many of the loudest advocates of a constitutional amendment at this time will oppose such an amendment as soon as it is offered. If the President were to abandon his own plan tomorrow in favor of a constitutional amendment, the most gleeful people in America would be those persons who have succeeded in blocking the child-labor amendment by falsifying the issue. They are fully aware that with the expenditure of millions of dollars, and by unloosening a flood of propaganda, they could delay passage of such an amendment indefinitely. They know that 13 small States, with a total population of only five and one-half million, less than 4 percent of our total population, could block such an amendment. They would concentrate the full force of their opposition in these small States. Their early activities in this controversy clearly denote what their future tactics will be and I for one am not willing to place my bet on the nose of a constitutional amendment as the only solution to our problems.

I am a strong advocate of the Supreme Court and I believe in an independent judiciary, but at the same time I believe more strongly in an independent, vigorous legislative body. I want to see the Supreme Court preserved and I want to see it function under the powers specifically prescribed by our Constitution. The President's proposal will do more to preserve the sanctity of the Supreme Court and the Constitution of the United States than any other movement which I know of at the present time. The Constitution and our institutions are safe only so long as their guaranties to the general welfare of the Nation are vital forces. Our Constitution is in daily danger as long as 10,000,000 independent American men and women roam our streets without gainful employment and as long as other millions are living on bare subsistent wages. Democracy itself is in danger as long as one-third of our population remains ill clothed, ill housed, and ill fed. If we would preserve our cherished institutions, we must return our unemployed to work in private industry; we must give the wage earner a fair share of what he earns; we must preserve the independent farmer at all costs; we must hold out hope and opportunity to the youth of our Nation; and to those of advanced years we must promise security. Then, and then only, will the Constitution of the United States be secure forever in the steel-clad vault of general prosperity and contentment. [Applause.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUTHOFF].

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, the coal business is a sick industry. A review of the industry, with all its varying vicissitudes of fortune during the last quarter of a century, shows the necessity for drastic action. The uncertainty of consumption, the high cost of distribution, the decline in industrial activity, the competition of oil and electricity, the high financial hazard, the large percentage of unemployed and resulting misery and hardship, all lead to the inevitable conclusion that the emergency efforts attempted during the past 25 years to afford some temporary relief have accomplished little of lasting benefit and must therefore be discarded as inadequate to meet the demands of this pressing problem.

At the close of the nineteenth century, with the expansion of industry, which marked the change in our history from that of an agricultural to an industrial nation, began the expansion of coal consumption. This expansion of the coal industry was further accelerated by railroad building into new producing fields, until we come to the period of the World War, when an extraordinary and abnormal demand for coal was made upon American coal mines. With increased demand came increased prices, which stimulated further mine development; new coal fields were opened up, and consequently large excess mine capacity and lower prices resulted. The price was further hammered down by improved methods of the use of coal by industry, railroads, and public-utility companies. Furthermore, other fuels entered the field in competition with coal, all of which tended to create an era of deflation and liquidation.

During the boom years between 1923 and 1929, when the country as a whole was experiencing the so-called "Coolidge boom", the bituminous coal-mining industry was suffering a serious setback. During those 6 years the number of commercial bituminous mines in operation was cut from 9,331 to 6,057 and the potential capacity, on the basis of 308 working days per annum, from 970,000,000 to 752,000,000 tons. The number of men employed declined from 705,000 to 503,000.

When we reached the bottom of the depression in 1932, the number of active commercial operations had been cut to 5,427, while the number of men employed in active work had shrunk to 406,000. In 1932, also, the average number of days during which the mines were operated had dropped to 146, while the industry had corporate losses of $51,167,000. As our country gradually recovered, there was an upswing in the coal industry. In 1933 the number of active commercial operations had risen to 5,500, while the number of men employed had risen to 419,000. Net losses were cut to $47,439,000.

In 1934 the 35-hour week was adopted and there was also an increase in the demand for coal, so that the number employed rose to 462,000 men.

In the October 1936 edition of Coal Age there is an article entitled "Economic Status of the Coal Mining Industry in the Last Quarter Century." I have copied freely from this article. I wish to point out the following excerpt:

> During the last quarter of a century, production climbed to 579,000,000 tons in the war year of 1918 and plunged to 310,000,000 tons in the depression year of 1932, the smallest total in any year since 1904. And on the financial side there is the picture of 1,234 companies showing a combined net income of $632,281,417 for the 5-year period 1917–21, and the industry as a whole reported a total loss of $204,354,075 in the 5-year period 1929–33.

These figures are, of course, the extremes, but they set forth in a rather dramatic way the economic picture of the coal industry and its many hazards. As this article well says, a résumé of these basic changes all point to one conclusion:

> In less than a single generation the soft-coal industry has been transformed from a speculative venture, dependent upon abnormal conditions for large short-term profits, into a business which must rely upon regular movement, low cost, and modern merchandising methods for its future financial success.

The main difficulty with this industry is that there is no yardstick by which anyone can gage future consumption and adjust production to the demand. From 1870 to 1920 the consumption of coal in the United States doubled every decade. This is no longer true. Coal now fluctuates with industrial activity. A study of the coal industry indicates that consumption is dependent upon the tonnage used by manufacturers, railroads, and public-utility companies, and this consumption is, in turn, affected by other competing fuels and also more efficient methods of utilizing coal.

Oil, natural gas, and water power have taken markets away from coal. Of these, water power has undoubtedly made the heaviest inroads.

> Oil, of course, is wholly responsible for the decline in the consumption of coal for bunkering, while both oil and gas have gained in the public-utility field, water power has been chief beneficiary of recent shifts there.

The Government has entered upon a broad field of expansion in water power as a source of energy and must, therefore, face some of the responsibility for replacing coal as a form of energy.

ATTEMPTED REMEDIES

At different times efforts were made to regulate the coal industry by calling upon the Federal Government for aid. In 1914 coal operators in Illinois and Indiana made such a request, but nothing came of it. The first real determined effort at actual regulation was taken during the war, when the United States Fuel Administration assumed control of prices, distribution, and wages. The latter agency was created during a time of emergency, and lapsed when the war ended. Minor efforts for regulation followed at different times, but not on a great national scale until the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act. This act attempted to lay down some definite regulations through codes in order that working conditions might be improved and prices adjusted; but when that act was found unconstitutional (May 1935), its effectiveness was, of course, destroyed. The last national effort to aid the industry was the passage of the Guffey-Snyder coal bill, and this act, too, was found unconstitutional—May 1936.

During the war it was necessary to put a stop to extortionate prices, while under the National Industrial Recovery Act it was necessary to raise the price in order to secure higher wages and stabilize the industry.

Unfortunately, the National Industrial Recovery Act did not achieve the great results which were hoped for and expected. This was due partly to defects in the law and partly to defects in the administration of the law. A large majority of the codes were drafted by big business, and labor had little or nothing to say about them. All labor ever got out of the National Industrial Recovery Act was the right to bargain, if and when labor was strong enough to enforce that right. As Jett Lauck points out in his article Coal Labor Legislation in the Annals of the American Academy of Social Science, March 1936:

> The effectiveness of the National Industrial Recovery Act was finally destroyed by the attitude and procedure of its administration as to code authorities. The grotesque ruling was made that "industrial self-government" meant the control of industry by the management of industry. Labor and consumer were debarred from any actual participation.

Grafters, chiselers, and musclers-in, placing their own greed and selfishness ahead of their country's welfare, defeated the wishes of the President and helped to break down this well-intentioned measure. They were the industrial slackers at the time of their country's distress.

During this time the coal industry was worse off than before. Coal producers, jealous and envious of each other, failed to get together, and the United Mine Workers, for all practical purposes, had no assertive rights in the preparation of their codes. The situation in the bituminous-coal industry grew gradually worse; and the producers being unable to come together on a satisfactory basis, Congress sought to remedy the coal-trade evils by legislation, and the Guffey-Snyder bill was the result.

The main feature of this bill was the levying of a tax on the consumer of coal, the proceeds of such tax to be paid the miners in increase of wages and to help stabilize the industry. The inherent defect in such a system is the shifting of a burden from the shoulders of one class of unfortunates to the shoulders of another class equally unfortunate, namely, the consumer. In my State of Wisconsin the temperature sometimes falls to 40° below zero. Sometimes there is zero weather for several consecutive weeks. Under such conditions, fuel is an absolute necessity. To raise its price to those who now can buy only a basketful of coal at a time is not and cannot be a solution of our problem.

In my home city of Madison, Wis., the following prices went into effect February 1, 1937: These increases in price range from 20 to 95 cents a ton under United States grades.

Pocahontas and coke are now priced at $11.40 per ton. One of the local dealers in accounting for the raise said:

> The price of Pocahontas at the mines is now at least $1.40 a ton more than it was in August.

Egg and nut sizes of coal are now $15.20 a ton, $13.30 to $14.25 on pea coal, and from $11 to $11.65 on stoker buckwheat coal. If a family must use 10 to 12 tons of coal each year, one can readily see what a tremendous burden this is upon a wage earner of moderate income.

Let it be thoroughly understood that I am fully in accord with John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers of America, when he said, in 1922, in testifying before the Bland committee of the House of Representatives:

> Some national authority over the coal industry is necessary, call it what you may.

There are some groups in the coal industry which are opposed to Government regulation. One group believes in unrestricted competition without any interference of any kind. Another believes that the industry can and ought to regulate itself by forming an association. However, experience has demonstrated that neither of these positions is tenable, as neither group has as yet eradicated the enormous waste from the coal industry. This waste consists not only of millions upon millions of tons of coal itself but also consists in the starvation, misery, and despair of unemployment and all the human wreckage that results from such a condition.

PERMANENT REMEDY

I appreciate that the new Guffey coal bill is a temporary, emergency measure, but I have come to realize that temporary measures have a way of becoming permanent, and in so doing merely increase the cost of living without solving the problem. I want to increase the miners' pay and at the same time reduce the cost to the consumer. This can be done only by taking private profits out of coal, and the best way to do that is to nationalize the coal industry. I appreciate that such a task is not a simple one, nor can it be done overnight, but it can and should be done, and the time to begin is now. We may temporize, we may procrastinate, we may by crafty evasion and devious circumlocution refuse to face the test, but I firmly believe that it can be done, that it should be done, and that we should have the courage to undertake it.

Nationalizing the coal mines will come because the American people will demand it. The case rests on a solid basis of facts. The enormous wastes—economic wastes and human wastes—resulting from private ownership have led to a situation of unrest and chaos from which there is no escape and no relief except in public ownership and democratic management. Economic forces and the instincts of the American people are creating an irresistible sentiment for nationalization.

The material herewith submitted is taken from a pamphlet entitled "How to Run Coal", issued by the nationalization research committee, United Mine Workers of America, in 1922.

The present private control of coal is doomed. Why? Because the coal industry has been so disorganized and mismanaged that the situation in recent years has approached what big-business men and stand-pat senators describe as a catastrophe. Intelligent men, with the welfare of the industry at heart, agree that the "game is up"—the old game of speculative profits, overproduction, shortages, sky-high prices, unemployment, gunmen, spies, the murder of miners, a sullen, desperate public. Unless unification and order enter the industry there will be a blow-up somewhere, followed by drastic, angry, and frenzied legislation. The American kingdom of coal is today in as chaotic and explosive a condition as the states of Europe.

The only large-scale proposal has come from the United Mine Workers of America in their demand for nationalization. It is the only proposal that grapples with slack work for the miners, high prices, and irregular supply for the consumer.

Under public ownership and democratic administration the coal industry will find out how much coal the people want, how much of a supply is already in stock, what is the cost of mining coal, how much pay a miner gets, and what the correct price is for a ton of coal. These are simple, easy, fundamental, and essential facts in running an industry. But not one of these elementary facts is known today. A permanent fact-finding agency will be one of the instruments of control.

But any plan of nationalization must also include ownership by the public. Ownership of the mines by the miners alone would be as unjust and as disastrous as ownership by the coal operators has proved itself to be. The public must give the final decision on the large issues of the industry. But it is always ownership that gives this power of decision. So the public must own the mines.

THE COST OF IT

The cost of this plan is practically nothing. It merely calls for an exchange of securities.

According to the study of the Federal Trade Commission—1922—there is an investment somewhere between a billion and a half and two billion dollars in the soft-coal industry.

The value at the mine of the coal for a single year was over a billion and a half dollars in the year 1920. To own the soft-coal industry will take a little more than the selling price of coal f. o. b. mine for a single year.

The capital investment of the anthracite operators is given as $432,000,000 by the census of 1919. This is, of course, a very rough figure.

There remains the value of the coal beds—the coal in the ground as distinct from the mining plant. Insofar as coal-mining companies have invested money in coal-bearing lands more than sufficient for their present needs and which they are holding for future use, the figure of $2,000,000,000 for bituminous and $432,000,000 for anthracite—given above—includes some of the value of the coal beds.

We estimate the value of established expectations in coal as approximately $2,000,000,000.

So we have—all figures approximate:

Bituminous operators' investment	$2,000,000,000
Anthracite operators' investment	500,000,000
Present value at compound interest of the royalty payments which might be expected from the future production of coal	2,000,000,000
	4,500,000,000

From the statement by the anthracite representatives of the United Mine Workers of America to the United States Coal Commission on Anthracite Accounting and Finance in 1923, we learn that to retire all claims in the anthracite industry would cost just over a billion dollars—$1,024,280,000. If the total production for the next 50 years is 4,750,000,000 tons, the average would run somewhat higher in the first 27 years, when the old bonds were being eliminated, and somewhat lower thereafter. It is to be remembered that this billion dollars represents both principal and interest. The cash-down purchase price today on the basis of the above illustrative figures would be $400,000,000.

Now, if this illustrative estimate is anywhere within the margin of the facts, it leads to a startling conclusion. The cost per ton of such a refunding plan is about one-third of the claims of investors in 1920 and about one-fifth of what they estimated those claims were in 1923.

The average charges during 1918, 1919, and 1920 were, roughly:

	Cents per ton
Depletion	10
Interest	7
Profits	52
Total	78

Subtracting the average cost per ton as given above at 28 cents from the average charge of 78 cents per ton leaves a saving of 50 cents per ton at the mine, which is practically doubled or trebled when it gets to the consumer.

In 1923 they estimated the total claims of capital at $1.40 a ton, or just five times 28 cents.

It would appear, then, from such preliminary and illustrative figures that the public interest would stand to gain from 50 cents to $1 per ton at the pit mouth for every ton mined during the next 50 years, if the outstanding claims of investors could be retired on some such basis as is here outlined. This might mean two or three times this sum in retail prices because of the method of price increase customary in distribution at present.

THE LAW

I do not claim any originality whatever for the plan herewith submitted in the bill entitled H. R. 5138. The measure that I am advocating follows closely the plan outlined in the Wheeler bill for the nationalization of the railroads in the United States.

Title I

Creates the United States Coal Administration to take over the properties of the coal industry in the United States. Managed by a board of trustees of five members appointed by the President. These trustees shall incorporate as a Government agency.

Stock

The Coal Administration shall have common stock of $100,000,000 par value, which shall be subscribed for by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Powers

The Coal Administration shall have all ordinary powers of corporations and in addition thereto, the right of eminent domain so as to acquire property and facilities of any coal mine and coal property or any other property incidental thereto.

Issue Securities

The Coal Administration is empowered to issue and to fix the terms and conditions of debentures, income bonds, or preferred stock with which to acquire coal properties and properties incidental thereto, or securities of such properties. Such securities shall be guaranteed as to principal and interest by the United States.

Subsidiaries

The Coal Administration is empowered to create subsidiary corporations which shall have powers within the terms of this act.

Acquisition

A Coal Administration acquisition tribunal of three members appointed by the President is set up to acquire all coal property. For such purpose it may hire accountants, appraisers, and so forth, hold hearings, subpena witnesses, administer oaths, take testimony, examine witnesses, require the production of books, papers, and so forth, relative to the inquiry.

Title II

United States Coal Administration is authorized to acquire the possession, use, control, and ownership of properties used in the coal industry, for which compensation shall be paid. Such compensation may be made in debentures of the Coal Administration. Full provision is made for acquiring properties of companies that are unwilling to sell. Full hearings are provided for. Securities of the Coal Administration may be exchanged for securities of coal properties.

Penalties

Last few sections deal with penalties for failure to comply with the law.

Outstanding Features

The administration is vested in a board of trustees, consisting of five members. Such trustees shall be truly representative of the following: First, miners; second, managerial and technical staff; third, owners; fourth, consumers; and fifth, financial skill.

Guaranty of Principal and Interest by the United States

The net profits shall go toward the (1) reduction in the price of coal; (2) increase in wages of employees; (3) payment of indebtedness; and (4) dividends on common stock owned by the United States.

CONCLUSION

After a full hearing and discussion has been held on this measure it might be deemed advisable to have a board of trustees consist of seven members instead of five. I have no objection, but I favor the membership as outlined above with a representation as outlined above.

I feel that we must take drastic action to relieve the unhappy situation of the coal miners in the United States. Government ownership ought to, and I am satisfied will, free the coal miners and their families from the peonage of lives regimented in food, clothing, and shelter; in short, regimented from the cradle to the grave. With no hope for the future either for themselves or for their children, Government ownership, looking to their welfare, should give the promise of the dawn of a new day. [Applause.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF].

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENT ACT—SOFTENING THE MINDS OF THE PEOPLES OF THE WORLD

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act has been extended for another 3 years, and I take this opportunity to comment briefly upon the results already attained, and to comment at some length upon our past and present relations with a number of the countries with which the Secretary of State either has already concluded, or hopes to conclude, trade agreements. I shall also consider the possibilities of realizing "the larger purposes involved" to which the Secretary so often refers, and which he hopes to bring to realization through his administration of the act.

Mr. Chairman, utter indifference to our rapidly diminishing trade balance was the most significant fact apparent throughout the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee on the resolution to extend for 3 years the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act. That indifference was not only exhibited by Secretary of State Hull and his assistant, Mr. Sayre; they insisted in their testimony that favorable trade balances for this Nation were insignificant as compared to the achievement of a "softening of the minds of the world toward peace." I do not share their indifference. No matter what pertinent economic question was asked of the Secretary, his reply invariably was that it was "not relevant to the larger purposes involved", which, he said, was world peace.

The Secretary, in presenting his views to the committee, constantly stressed the great contribution to world peace which, in his opinion, had been achieved through his administration of the act. He stated that through the benefits extended under the act to foreign nations, there had been this "softening of the minds" of the peoples of the world in their international relations, and indicated that a more peaceful atmosphere now exists.

The whole theme of his argument was that through lowering our tariff barriers, and thus throwing our markets open to foreign producers, and allowing them to sell their products in this country in competition with American farmers and American manufacturers, we can bring about a "softening of the minds" toward us. Let us examine the facts.

Such an argument is utterly refuted by our experiences during and following the years 1917 to 1919, when we attempted to achieve and preserve more peaceful conditions in the world by contributing the lives and health of nearly half a million American boys, and by spending and lending more than $40,000,000,000 of the American taxpayers' money in an effort to "soften the minds" of the world.

The figures and facts involved in our efforts in those years are pathetic and appalling, and cause to shrink into insignificance any contention of the Secretary of State that reciprocal-trade agreements will accomplish what we failed to accomplish by our monumental sacrifices of those days.

Mr. Chairman, there were 39,362 American boys killed in action. There were 14,009 died of wounds received in action. There were 192,361 others wounded in action. That was an appalling contribution by us, futile though it was, toward the "softening of the minds" of the world.

There were 76,757 who died of disease, accident, and other causes during their service in the war. That was still another appalling American contribution to the peace of the world.

More than 100,000 veterans with service-connected disabilities have died since the war, many of them the victims of their service. There are today 336,236 World War veterans receiving compensation for service-connected disabilities. These constitute a continuing contribution by us to the peace of the world.

Our expenditures and loans on behalf of our allies during that period reached more than $40,000,000,000. How can any individual for a moment assert that if these stupendous sacrifices which we then made, and which we are still making, and will continue to make in the years to come, have not "softened the minds" of the world toward peace, that to give away our markets, to make a gesture as weak as reciprocal-trade agreements, would accomplish this most desirable result?

The human misery, the agony of human hearts, the grief that was poured into that war, and has been caused since, is utterly beyond human computation or human comprehension; yet, in spite of all that, the world continues to arm at a pace at which it never armed before, getting ready for war.

A "softening of the minds" toward peace is not to be achieved by our giving them our markets. The effort of the war-making and other nations today is to take from the United States of America every dollar in money or trade, in loans or commerce, they can possibly wring from us. And if and when another world war shall come, Mr. Chairman, no effort on the part of the warring nations will be spared to inveigle or drag us into the hellish maelstrom.

It goes beyond all human reason, I say, it is utterly at variance with every fact and of all logic to assume that to turn our American markets over to foreign competitors and to deprive our own people of employment in order to purchase by that move some "softening of the minds of the world toward peace" when these sacrifices, this immeasurable treasure of human life and human health and human happiness, and this incomprehensible wealth of gold failed to achieve that objective.

And, be it remembered, these sacrifices were offered, our treasure was poured out, while we asked not one foot of territory and not one single trade advantage in return therefor. The stupendous contribution by the United States to the cause of peace was made entirely without any consideration other than the cause of peace.

That is why many of us felt grave alarm as we sat through the hearings on the Ways and Means Committee and witnessed the complacent, unconcerned attitude of the Secretary of State and his aides, who, with their eyes fixed on this vision of "softening the minds of the world toward peace", seemed prepared to give away the last market in America, regardless of its effects upon our own people.

This vision of "softening the mind of the world for peace" is a beautiful dream. The arguments are soothing in this day of a troubled planet. Wishful thinking is easy under such circumstances, and where wishful thinking enters, logic departs.

I find no quarrel with the Secretary of State because of his visions of peace. I would that such a vision might be made true. But the course of troubled Europe has been has seemed again to come upon mankind, and not to insuch as to compel every thinking man in this country to return to logic, and to try to think through the fever that dulge in idle dreams. The idleness of these dreams is fully demonstrated by the utter failure of the sacrifices we have made heretofore. By those sacrifices we have achieved not one single thing except to expose us to the ambitions, the greeds, the avarice, the hatreds, and the envies of the other nations that today are preparing for red war.

The act has been in effect approximately 2 years. Everybody knows that during this period misunderstandings, suspicion, and antagonism between nations have increased in intensity almost day by day. The newspapers are filled with rumors of war. The whole world is alarmed for fear that another world madness is upon us.

Not even during the days just preceding the last one did war seem as imminent as it does today. Another such war, the horrors of which will cause those of that other one to pale into insignificance, will destroy this civilization. And yet most of those European nations with which the Secretary of State is seeking to engage in these trade agreements, are feverishly preparing for war, spending sums of money so huge as to stagger the imagination, money that should, in part at least, be paid to us who are their creditors.

In this connection it is important and disillusioning to ponder the present status of the so-called war debts, and consider them and their relation to this whole subject. It is enlightening but disheartening to observe that the nations which today are creating through their warlike activities consternation in the hearts of lovers of world peace, and who are spending billions upon billions for war purposes, are among those who have so far forgotten the dictates of plain, common honesty and fair dealing as to repudiate their debts to us.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print as part of my remarks statements showing total indebtedness of foreign governments to the United States as of January 15, 1937, as follows:

Statement showing principal of debt as funded, interest funded under agreements, and amount to be received over funding period on account of principal and interest

GREAT BRITAIN

Mr. Chairman, it was officially annouced recently that the British Government is to spend for war materials and supplies during the next 5 years the enormous sum of seven and one-half billions of dollars. An examination of the table above discloses the fact that His Majesty's Government now owes us the sum of $5,107,000,000. Of this amount $739,446,980.97 in principal and interest is past due.

Their total debt to us constitutes approximately two-thirds the sum they propose to spend within the next 5 years for their Navy and other war equipment—and yet they would have us believe they are financially unable to pay us, their saviors, the comparatively modest annual sum they formerly agreed to pay.

This current British indebtedness has been accumulating since that nation, together with all other debtor countries except Finland—great in honor, though small in size—bluntly informed us that they were "unable to pay."

It must be clear, even to those who wilfully close their eyes to facts not fitting their theories and purposes, that if our British and other debtor friends had cared to deal with us frankly they would have said, "We do not wish to pay; we will not pay."

An individual who can, but will not, pay his honest debt is utterly unworthy the respect of anyone. A nation which does so is contemptible, particularly when the money it borrowed was used to preserve its national life, loaned it when its very national existence depended upon its ability to borrow.

The more than thirteen billions England and the other nations owe us equals exactly that portion of our national debt. The American people are now paying the interest and must eventually pay the principal of these foreign debts, unless our debtors repay us, which, of course, they do not propose to do. Our national debt is now, in round figures, $35,000,000,000. Approximately 40 percent of this amount is represented by the moneys our ungrateful debtors owe us. These loans must be reckoned among those things we have contributed to bring about a "softening of the minds of the peoples of the world to preserve peace."

When we extended these loans to foreign governments we did not have the money in the Treasury; we had to find it elsewhere. There was only one way in which we could get it, and that was to borrow it from our own citizens, which we did. We secured them with good, honest United States Government bonds. We have since been taxing all our people to redeem these obligations, which have been, or will be, paid in full. Thank God, this Nation is not one which repudiates its honest debts.

Quite recently Walter Runciman, president of the British Board of Trade, was in this country allegedly with a view of increasing trade between his country and ours. The position he occupies is semiofficial. It is understood that the gentleman left these shores without reaching an agreement. It is doubtful if an agreement can be reached unless we grant tariff concessions far beyond anything they have been hoping for. My reasons for so thinking were cited by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] when discussing this subject in general debate on the resolution in the Committee of the Whole, when he quoted from an editorial in the recent edition of the London Economist, which stated:

> It is fully possible * * * that Great Britain has already gained more from the concessions made by the United States in her treaties with other countries than could be obtained in a direct Anglo-American treaty.

We have no trade agreement with Great Britain. The opinion of the editor of the London Economist is no doubt based upon the fact that our exports to that country for the first 11 months of 1936 increased but 2 percent over the corresponding period of the previous year, while our imports from that country during the same period increased 24 percent. Unless we make them a concession, which the welfare of our farmers and workers absolutely forbids, it is my opinion that no trade agreement will be reached with Great Britain.

Her public officials are not blind to the fact that by exercising patience, and waiting until we have entered into more and more agreements with other countries, reducing tariffs on more and more of the products she wishes to sell in this market, she will in the probable near future secure for herself all and more concessions than she could hope to secure, even if she were to enter into a trade agreement with us. In this way she avoids giving us any concession whatsoever in return for the markets we present to her.

Do not forget that every single item heretofore kept out of this market by our tariff wall, and which she is now selling in this country, or which she may sell as a result of future agreements, is sold in competition with, and usually below the price of, American products produced by American labor either in the factory or on the farm.

Practically all products not in competition with American factory or farm are on the free list and can be brought into this market without limit and without the payment to this Government of one red cent. That this is no small concession in itself is realized when it is known that during the years 1922 to 1936, inclusive, the foreign producers brought into this market and sold products to the value of $28,868,449,000, paying nothing for the privilege.

Our free list for imports is longer than that of any other country in the world. This in itself should be recognized as a genuine contribution to the "softening of the minds" of the world, provided, of course, the Secretary of State is justified in assuming the correctness of the theories he expounds.

FRANCE

France now owes us the total sum of $4,081,227,249.62. Of this amount $178,940,749.62 is past due, and has been accumulating since the time when all the debtor nations—always excepting little Finland—by common consent and agreement declared to us they could not pay.

Inasmuch as France is one of the 75 nations which receives all the concessions incorporated in reciprocal-trade agreements entered into by us with other countries, we ought at least to be interested to learn how rapidly she is experiencing a "softening of the mind" toward us and toward her European neighbors, and whether or not she is acting with that scrupulous regard for her honest obligations which we have a right to expect.

I know the Members of the House will pardon me if at this point in my remarks I indulge in a few reminiscences in connection with my experience in France in May 1917, just after this country had declared war on Germany, and when we had announced our intention of spending our last resource, if necessary, to insure victory for our allies.

When I disembarked at Bordeaux I beheld the greatest array of flags I had ever seen anywhere on any occasion. They were displayed on buildings, on lamp posts, everywhere. I discovered that these flags were almost exclusively French and American. An occasional English flag could be seen, yes; but the event the French people were celebrating was our declaration of war against their enemy.

I was in France for several weeks, and my mission there brought me in contact with a number of men high in the councils of the Government. They were exceedingly frank in those days, and they did not hesitate to tell just what our action meant to them. One gentleman summed up their collective opinion when he said to me, "You perhaps cannot account for the consuming enthusiasm which has seized upon our people unless you realize that when your country entered the war we were bled white. We were defeated. It is only the knowledge that you are coming that gives us the courage to hold on until you arrive." In other words, they believed then that without our help France could not have hoped for victory. They were exceedingly grateful to us. They lost no opportunity in those days of showing their gratitude. But, Mr. Chairman, they were in danger then. How do they react today? What is their attitude toward us as indicated by their actions in the past few years?

Because we have dared to suggest to them that they return to us the money we loaned to them, money not only for the purpose of carrying on their war activities but also money for the economic rehabilitation of their war-weary and war-torn country; because we have dared to suggest to them that their citizens be taxed instead of ours to repay this money, we are now reviled and looked upon as a nation of Shylocks.

And what have they been doing, Mr. Chairman, since the day they declined to make further payments on their debt to us? They have been spending more and more each year preparing for war. A small part of the money they are spending each year for this purpose would meet their pledged payments to us, and we would have some assurance that the French people, in whose interest this money was spent, and not the American people, are going to be taxed eventually to discharge this obligation.

What evidence, Mr. Chairman, have we that the French nation is experiencing this "softening of the mind" that the Secretary of State seems to believe is permeating the collective consciousness of the world as a result of this reciprocal trade agreement program? Is there less suspicion, less envy, less fear between France and her European neighbors? Is there less of intrigue, less pitting of interests of one nation against those of others to bring about a condition satisfactory to the French? I know of no such evidence.

I do know, Mr. Chairman, that there has been no time in history when world peace was so seriously endangered as now, and that the activities of those nations that suffered most from the World War, one of which is France, are contributing much to the present unsettled condition of the world.

ITALY

Italy, Mr. Chairman, is another nation that should by reason of her experience with us have a broad spirit of brotherly love. Her debt to us, measured in American dollars, is $2,017,900,000. She also has found it inconvenient to pay, notwithstanding the preferred treatment she received over all other debtor nations at the time the debts were refunded.

In this connection I will say that reductions in the foreign debts were made by reducing the interest charge rather than the principal of the loan. An examination of the rates granted the various nations shows that Great Britain, Finland, Hungary, Poland, Esthonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Czechoslovakia, and Rumania all pay 3.3 percent, while Belgium pays 1.8 percent, France 1.6 percent, Jugoslavia 1 percent, and Italy four-tenths of 1 percent.

It was recognized, by unbiased persons at least, that the provisions of the Versailles Treaty were such as inevitably to lead to future wars; that instead of making the world "safe for democracy" and insuring peace, the effect would be the reverse. Had the leadership and the splendid example of the American people, speaking through Woodrow Wilson, been followed by the representatives of other nations at that conference, the history of the world would have been changed. Notwithstanding our great sacrifices of life, of health, of money, we asked for not one dollar in indemnity, for not one foot of additional territory.

President Wilson was there as the spokesman for all the people of these United States. His was the opportunity to demonstrate to the world once and for all that we could and would settle our differences with nations on a basis of unselfishness, on a basis of live and let live, on a basis of mutual understanding and respect for the rights of others, a basis, I will say, foreign to the code of every other nation represented at the conference.

In all history this was the greatest contribution by a people ever presented by ruler or potentate to the "softening of the minds" of the peoples of the world, and yet the seeds we sowed there were sowed on barren ground. That they bore no fruit was demonstrated at the time, has been since, and is now being demonstrated by the aggressions of Italy in Ethiopia and elsewhere, and by many other nations in their relations with their neighbors.

Can we believe that Italy, under the despotism of Mussolini, is undergoing a "softening of the mind", when we ponder Italy's course in Ethiopia? When we remember the 2,000 citizens of that stricken country that were summarily hunted down a few days ago and butchered because they were suspected of striking a blow in defense of their liberty? Who believes Mussolini's mind is filled with thoughts of light and love?

RUSSIA

Mr. Chairman, the Government of Soviet Russia has been "recognized" officially by the Government of the United States. The people of that country owe the people of this country in the aggregate the sum of $366,688,455.88. Regardless of the fact that this money was borrowed during a previous régimé, the fact remains that it was borrowed from the citizens of this country and used for the benefit of the citizens of Russia.

Payment of this debt constitutes a sacred obligation upon the existing Government, regardless of its character. Did our responsible authorities, before officially "recognizing" that country, secure from it a bona-fide commitment that Russia would pay this honest debt? I have no assurances that such commitment was secured. At all events, the fact is the debt has not been paid and there is no indication at this time that the debt ever will be paid.

"Recognition" placed Russia upon exactly the same basis with us as any other country in the world, and we find ourselves now, under the Trade Agreement Act, extending to her all the tariff and import concessions we extend to any or all other nations in the world. We do this whether she pays her debt to us or whether she does not. We do this whether she enters into a trade agreement with us, giving us trade advantages in return, or whether she does not.

Russia today boasts the greatest organized military establishment on the planet. This is her gesture toward "softening the minds of the world" toward peace.

JAPAN

Japan, while she undersells our own manufacturers in our own country, while she brazenly buys—and blandly denies—military information from a former officer of the United States Navy, shares in all the benefits of these reciprocal-trade agreements. Who believes that the Japanese mind has been "softened toward peace" when one remembers her aggressions in China?

Mr. Chairman, the overtone of threats, the tempest of rattling swords, the dance of billions for rearmament throughout the world seems to the State Department a gentle zephyr wafting the breath of peace over the softened hearts of nations.

GERMANY

Germany is one of only two nations excluded from the benefits of these trade agreements. That does not alter the fact, however, that Germany owes this Nation $1,200,000,000 which she does not pay. Why? Because she is rebuilding her military machine, while her besabered legions raise their steins to "der Tag."

WISHFUL THINKING

Mr. Chairman, how is it possible for the Secretary of State to see in the conditions I have endeavored faithfully to set out here a vision of peace to be achieved by his program of reciprocal-trade agreements?

I submit as an example of the State Department's wishful thinking a quotation from Constantine Brown, in a recent issue of a Washington paper, in which high officials of the State Department are quoted as saying:

People cannot possibly endure this reckless extravagance much longer. Sooner or later they will wake up and find out that spending money on unproductive construction—guns, airplanes, warships, and fortifications—can lead them nowhere. And the people themselves will eventually impose their will on their respective governments and force them to put an end to this drunken sailor's attitude of the last 2 years. When this happens the world will be ready to adopt a saner attitude toward international relations.

Yes, Mr. Chairman; when the German masses take back their liberty, when the Italian people reassert their independence, when the multitudes of Russia throw off the bitter yoke of servitude, when the Japanese lay aside their world-domination ambitions, the minds of the world may be "softened toward peace." But it must be obvious to any man or any woman in this House that if we are to purchase this "saner attitude toward international relations" by these reciprocal-trade agreements that the markets of America will have become exhausted, the wage earners of America will be workless, and the farmers of America will be destitute long before this Utopia is achieved.

Mr. Chairman, I have seen war. No individual in this broad land possibly could desire more fervently than do I peace on earth toward men of good will. Because of that very deep desire I have sought earnestly to find in Secretary Hull's reciprocal-trade policy the pathway to the world of his dreams. I wish it were true. But it is futile. It is worse than futile. In 2 years we have concluded 14 agreements, and we have sunk from a favorable trade balance of approximately $477,000,000 to an unfavorable trade balance of more than $4,500,000. In this connection may I state that during this period exports of agricultural products decreased $38,192,000, while imports of these commodities increased $199,139,000, reaching a grand total of agricultural imports for 1936 of $1,304,900,000. If this be the result of 14 agreements in 2 years, what, I ask, will be the condition if we conclude 60 additional treaties lowering the tariff, as each agreement is entered into, on additional products which compete with American-grown or American-manufactured products, as the Secretary of State desires to do?

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say I do not question the integrity, high purpose, and sincerity of Secretary Hull and Mr. Sayre. I want no word of mine to be construed as disrespectful of these men or derisive of their motives. Disagreeing utterly with their method, I agree wholly with their ideal. It is because I believe these gentlemen are sincerely mistaken that I am alarmed. What would not any of us give if we might achieve that world peace that Secretary Hull desires? But we owe it to the American people to face the stern realities in the great world crisis confronting us. What a bitter thing it is to consider the futility of reciprocal-trade agreements to accomplish world peace and to realize that men having the authority and the will to continue this policy with all its destructive effects seem utterly blind to that fact. [Applause.]

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. THOM].

Mr. THOM. Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of the naval appropriations bill, it is to be remembered that the amounts of money allocated are largely in direct response to the naval policy heretofore laid down by a preceding Congress. When the Seventy-third Congress voted for a Navy in conformity with the category of vessels allowed by the naval limitation treaties then in existence, it reposed power in the President to order replacement of one aircraft carrier, 99,200 tons of over-age destroyers, and 35,530 tons of over-age submarines, besides authorizing him to replace by vessels of modern design and construction the battleships of our fleet as they reached the age of 20 years. This latter provision opened the way for the replacement of 15 battleships—our entire strength in this class—by 1942.

It is about the question of battleship construction that I desire to make some observations. Since airplane warfare has come to be a reality, and even before when undersea craft came into naval use, much has been written and said about the vulnerability of battleships. Changed methods of warfare, some said, would make it necessary to hide away battleships so that they would not be blown to pieces from the air or from under water. From this kind of talk naturally flowed not a little bit of feeling widely held that continued construction of battleships was a wanton waste of public funds. No layman, therefore, but who has been wondering whether there is any truth in all of this.

For my own information, I have been looking around as a member of the Naval Appropriations Subcommittee to discover, if possible, whether we are in fact throwing away money on a useless but indeed costly piece of armament. Little or no expert answer can be obtained except from naval officers or civilian writers on naval subjects. Of course, the man in the street has an opinion, but one realizes that while he might prove right about it, yet his conclusions have been reached without much study. The first thing that one finds is that, generally speaking, naval strategists still believe that battleships are necessary for modern warfare, and consequently all the leading navies are now building, or have plans on way to construct, new battleship tonnage.

Let us enumerate. Jane's Fighting Ships, the chief authority on shipbuilding, tells us that France has in the blueprint stage two battleships, the Richelieu and Jean Bart, remarkable for the performance they are expected to give in speed and hitting power. Two other heavy ships of 26,500 tons, the Dunkerque and Strasburg, are now nearing completion.

The same authority tells us that two 35,000-ton, 30-knot, 14-inch-gun battleships are projected by Germany and that the Scharnhorst and Gneisianu, heavily armored, 11-inch-gun, 26,000-ton battleships are partly completed.

Italy is planning the Littorio and Vittorio Veneto, with nine 15-inch guns.

Jane's is less specific about Japanese battleship plans, noting only that "four new battleships are projected, two of which are expected to be begun in 1937."

Lastly, England saw recently the keels laid for the battleships King George V and Prince of Wales, and Parliament is now debating new and far-reaching naval plans, calling for three more battleships for this year. For a long-distance program, England is discussing not a battleship strength of 15 units, as presently maintained both by her and the United States, but an expansion to 24 or 25 units by the construction of new ships and by the modernization of its present 15 ships in this category.

In the light of all these programs, indicating a still thorough going belief in the efficacy of the battleship, the United States, by order of the President, is drawing plans for two new replacement battleships, and this appropriation bill is carrying the necessary moneys to begin work on them.

It is, therefore, easy to see that the battleship has not lost its popularity among naval men despite the growing expansion of air armament and its admitted power in attack.

The same doubts of the value of the battleship in the midst of new and modern implements of attack from the air have afflicted the English mind and led to an investigation by a subcommittee of the Parliament Committee of Imperial Defense on the subject of the Vulnerability of Capital Ships to Air Attack, culminating in the issuance of a so-called White Paper, dated November 1936, in which the conclusions of this body of civilians were incorporated.

The names of the members of the investigating committee were: T. W. H. Inskip, chairman; Lord Halifax, Malcolm MacDonald, and Walter Runciman, the last named having just visited President Roosevelt, and who is looked upon as one of the strongest men in the British Cabinet.

Their report as issued is ably reasoned and written, and it leaves one feeling that the question of the degree of vulnerability of battleships is entirely debatable, especially when the strongest paragraph written in favor of the continued employment of battleships, hereto appended, is examined:

> If capital ships are essential to our security we must have them. We are dependent, as is no other nation, on the maintenance of our overseas trade. We have more to lose by making a false decision in so vital a matter than has any other power. Yet no other great naval power, though with less risk than we ourselves should run, proposes to do away with capital ships. Should we be the first to do so? Surely not, unless the question is settled beyond all possible doubt. We do not find that the question is so settled. It may never be settled without the test of war, but the information at present at our disposal leads us to believe that the day of the capital ship is not over, now or in the near future; to assume that it is and to cease to build them would lead to grave risk of disaster.
> It is possible to state the matter in the simplest possible terms. The advocates of the extreme air view would wish this country to build no capital ships (other powers still continuing to build them). If their theories turn out well founded we have wasted money; if ill founded, we would, in putting them to the test, have lost the Empire.

This conclusion of the Commission I shall supplement with some of the supporting data in condensed form. It is pointed out that new forms of attack such as the airplane sooner or later produce new forms of defense. The last 40 years saw the advent of the submarine, the torpedo, and the mine. Naval experts turned their minds to counteracting the possible effects of their attacks on capital ships, and now the air attack must be combatted.

Bombing from an airplane, the Commission report points out, takes three forms. Level bombing is undertaken from a high altitude. Dive bombing involves attack from a steeply diving airplane. Torpedo attack consists of dropping torpedoes from aircraft at a low altitude abeam the ship.

What has been done to meet this power of the airplane?

First of all, armor plate has been thickened after tests have shown the penetrating power of bombs. In the new British capital ships, a turtleback arrangement of side and deck armor is planned to deflect aerial attacks. The ships will be outfitted for being made completely gas-tight on short notice.

In the way of offense, the battleship, as we all know, has the anti-aircraft guns to fall back on, and the tendency is to increase the volume of fire. The Commission found that the rate of hits in tests of anti-aircraft guns do not throw much light on their value because of difficulty in simulating real warfare. Interesting, however, are the facts produced that anti-aircraft fire, even if nonvital, would unnerve the air forces and cause them to take poor aim in bomb dropping. It would also have a tendency to drive an airplane to higher altitudes, thus making its attack less sure.

The argument that more in the way of naval strength can be derived by spending funds for airplanes than capital ships was studied. The Commission found that 43 medium bombers could be bought for the price of a battleship. One of the witnesses estimated that the squadrons of airplanes needed for defense of trade and territory of Great Britain would entail a cost equivalent to that of 15 battleships. If this estimate were accepted, then the cost of the present battleship strength of England would be about the same as supplying the number of airplanes necessary to do the same work.

Having concluded my digest, I now close by reading the justification for battleships as given in the recent hearings on the naval appropriations bill by Admiral Land, Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair:

> The modern battleship is so designed, constructed, and built that while it is not immune—and I doubt if such a thing as complete immunity can be given—it is such an uninteresting target, due to its many protective features, devices, and so forth, that we are amply justified in proceeding with the construction of them. The menace of the air to a battleship is much less than the so-called proponents of the air ever concede, or are willing to concede. It nevertheless remains a fact. So that we feel with the design as now prepared and approved that the menace from the air is very materially reduced over what has been in existence heretofore, and that we should go ahead with this type of ship, which cannot only give, but take and take and take punishment; it can take punishment far better than any other class of ship.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I thought these facts, and these condensed statements from the English Commission, which, as far as I can learn, is the latest official report on the subject of the vulnerability of battleships, would be of interest at least to those of us who have heard the oft made claim that the battleship is no longer a necessary adjunct to the fighting forces of a nation. [Applause.]

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. FORD].

FEDERAL AID FOR EDUCATION

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, for the second time since I came to Congress I rise to direct the attention of Members to the necessity for inaugurating a permanent policy of Federal aid for education in this country.

All over the Nation parents and teachers find themselves facing a peculiar situation as regards the education of modern youth. The best methods for the operation of free public schools have been scientifically determined by experts who have given long study to educational problems, and there is a large number of available well-trained teachers who can carry into effect the methods which have been established. The only impediment—and that is a serious one—is the lack of sufficient financial support for schools located in thousands of communities in many States of the Union. These communities are places wherein education is at a premium, where many intelligent boys and girls possessed of character and ambition are eager to take advantage of every educational opportunity. Here we have children literally thirsting for knowledge, and they would make the best possible use of any learning obtained.

So, as I have previously pointed out, the lack of funds necessary to carry on our schools is a difficulty that so dangerously threatens our educational structure as to make its present benefits and future operation matters of fearful doubt and speculation. We have the statesmanship in this country and we have a Government with sufficient funds to solve this problem of inadequate finances and remove this intolerable menace.

In this connection I look back to my speech of April 9, 1935, in which I made the following statement to this House:

> The children, the teachers, and the parents in many homes scattered over the broad area of the United States are wondering if those who represent them in the councils of the Nation will perform their duty and eliminate this dread danger. What they want and what they should have is a sound, permanent program that will insure the future security of public education. They are entitled to it, and those who are entrusted with the direction of this Government should grant it as speedily as possible.

This was good doctrine 2 years ago and it is good doctrine today. The pity of it all is found in the deafness with which the congressional ear is so often turned to the importunities of a situation crying aloud for the benefit of Federal legislation—Federal legislation which should be easy to enact and easy to administer, with untold benefits resulting from the expenditure of a comparatively small sum of money.

May I say, Mr. Chairman, that education was once considered a parental responsibility, and was in turn assumed by the church, by the locality, and then by the State. There is nothing to prevent the assumption by the United States of its just share of the cost of education. Over a century ago we find the first five Presidents of the United States advocating Federal aid for education. They knew that a fine foundation for every nation is the proper education of its youth.

We have only to look about us and we see many sections of the country which are very poor, while others are very rich. Wealth has flown into the rich centers from the poor ones, and from the rich centers some of this money finds it way into the Treasury of the United States. I maintain that it is only fair that at least part of these funds should be returned to the poorer States for use in the education of their future citizens.

The principle underlying and supporting the advocacy of Federal aid for education has found application in our present system of Federal aid for roads, an item formerly restricted solely to State and local dominion. I believe in governmental assistance for promoting navigation, building necessary dams, and draining rivers, as well as in building roads. Am I lacking in logic when I say that the principles underlying activities of that kind can be consistently extended to educational endeavor? I think not. I believe it to be entirely logical.

Following further the logic of the argument, let me remind you that the Federal Government has assumed the responsibility of providing assistance toward social security in this country, and I am glad that it has done so, my only objection being that the Government has not been liberal enough in its provision for the aged. But let me here and now bring in the thought that uniform education, provided for by necessary assistance from the Federal Government, is a great guaranty of social security. Many are the citizens we have today, both men and women, who would have better equipped themselves with better educations had they been given a reasonable opportunity in which to do so. That they do not have educations highly necessary in these complex times is not their fault; it is the fault of the Government which did not provide the required educational facilities. In many instances the inadequacy was due to lack of funds which the State and local authorities could not hope to be able to raise.

I would further direct your attention to the fact that the States and local authorities have been struggling in a brave attempt to carry the burden of education as it should be carried. The result has been a people weighted down with high taxes. The real-estate tax is growing more and more inadequate, because of the decline in real-estate values, coupled with the gigantic increase in urban population. More than half our people now live in cities, and the major portion of our wealth is industrial. In many States the property tax is so sadly overworked as to nullify any hope of additional income from that source. The educational system must be improved and maintained, we all agree, but the increase of local taxes is out of the question. Even if we are to lay aside every consideration except the practical aspects of the question, there still remains only one solution—a permanent policy of Federal aid for education.

These convictions prompted me to introduce a bill in the last Congress, March 4, 1935, which sought the appropriation of $100,000,000 for Federal aid during the year ending June 30, 1936, and setting up a permanent plan of Federal aid beginning with June 30, 1937. This Congress has seen the introduction of several bills which carry the same principles as did the bill which I introduced. I ask you to give particular attention to S. 419 and its companion bills, H. R. 1634 and H. R. 2288, introduced in the early days of this session. The enactment of any of these bills would authorize the appropriation of at least a hundred million dollars a year for Federal aid to education in the various States, and sets up such aid as a permanent policy. I hope every Member of Congress will give this legislation his most earnest consideration, and I hope that the Committee on Education will report out a measure at once. I think that the House has already waited far too long about taking favorable action intended to substantially help education in the United States.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, something over 2 years ago I inflicted some rambling remarks upon the members of the committee concerning a question which at that time I thought was highly important and which I still think is important; in fact, more important than ever before. Perhaps my remarks will be recognized as coming from a man who is riding a hobby. It has to do with the submission of amendments to the Constitution of the United States. I am emboldened to bring this matter up again because we are hearing so much these days about the Constitution, its past, its present, and its future, and, incidentally, a good deal of discussion as to the advisability or practicability of amending it from time to time in order, as some people contend, to keep it up to date with modern progress.

I have introduced a duplicate of a bill which I introduced 2 years ago, and it has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It is H. R. 299. It proposes that the Congress shall exercise the power which I am convinced it possesses in the regulation of the method by which the States may pass upon amendments submitted to them by the Congress in accordance with the provisions of article 5 of the Constitution. The present machinery, or, rather, the lack of it—and I think that is an accurate description of the situation—has brought us to a point which, to say the least, is sloppy, a point where under certain sets of circumstances it is almost impossible to secure a decision from the requisite number of States after an amendment has been submitted to them in due course by the Congress.

To review the situation a little bit, may I remind those who are good enough to listen to me for a few moments that the Constitution has thus far been amended 21 times. True, the first 10 amendments were ratified practically in a single group. They were submitted by the First Congress, following the inauguration of Washington as President, as a result of what has been known as a gentleman's agreement amongst the leaders of the Thirteen States at that time that those 10 amendments or their equivalent would be submitted immediately after the convening of the new Congress, or else the requisite number of States—at that time nine—could not be marshaled in support of ratification of the original Constitution. It may not be remembered, however, that when that First Congress met it was not content with submitting 10 proposed amendments. It submitted 12 amendments. Amendment numbered 1 has not yet been ratified; amendment numbered 2 has not yet been ratified; and amendments 3 to 12, inclusive, were ratified and became the first 10 amendments inserted in the Constitution. It may interest Members to know that amendment numbered 1 had to do with the basis of representation for Members of the House of Representatives. Had it been ratified and kept as a part of the Constitution all these years, the House of Representatives would have consisted of about 2,000 Members at the present time.

The other provided that the compensation of Members of Congress should not be increased until a succeeding election had taken place after the proposed increase. Those two amendments are still pending. They have never been withdrawn from the States. There is no machinery for their withdrawal. One of them was ratified by six States and another one by seven States. In neither instance did nine States, the then requisite number, vote for ratification. In other words, they have been pending for 147 years.

I might emphasize this side of the situation by reminding you that when a State rejects an amendment, that action is not final. It may later change its mind and if it ratifies, then that action is final. So that unless an amendment is ratified it is forever pending; and unless there is something done to the contrary—and perhaps the much-criticized Supreme Court might come to our rescue in this respect—it can be taken up at any time, even after the expiration of 147 years. Each State is entitled to take it up. There is nothing to prevent it. A decision has not been made because, under our peculiar situation, the only decision that is final with respect to an amendment to the Constitution is an affirmative decision. There is no such thing as a final negative decision under our present machinery.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman care to yield for a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. My time is limited, if the gentleman will excuse me for a little while.

Then on May 1, 1810, another amendment was proposed and submitted to the States, which provided that if any citizen of the United States accepted a title of nobility from a foreign potentate, he should lose his citizenship and be ineligible to hold office in the United States. That amendment was submitted 126 years ago, and it is still pending. It has never been ratified by a sufficient number of States and, therefore, it still has life.

Seventy-five years ago another amendment was submitted, and this, to my mind, is the most interesting of the four unusual amendments that still have life. On the 2d day of March 1861, 2 days before Abraham Lincoln was inaugurated as President of the United States, the Congress submitted to the States a proposed amendment to the Constitution, which, had it been ratified, would have had this effect, that the Federal Government should have no right to interfere with a domestic institution inside of a State, including the institution of slavery. Two days before Lincoln was inaugurated the Congress submitted a proslavery amendment to the Federal Constitution. It might interest you to know that the State of Ohio ratified it. The State of Maryland ratified it. A rump convention, which happened to be sitting in the State of Illinois at Springfield, attempted to ratify it. Six weeks later Sumter was fired upon and the great issue was settled in another manner; but the amendment is still pending. I am not endeavoring to frighten you into believing that it will be resuscitated, but it is extraordinary that we should be in a situation of that sort.

So much for four amendments that are still pending. There is a fifth, the famous child-labor amendment now being discussed before so many State legislatures. It was submitted by the Congress on June 2, 1924. Therefore on the next 2d of June the child-labor amendment will have been pending before the States for 13 years, with no decision, unless indeed eight more States, as I figure it arithmetically now, ratify between this day and June 2.

I do not intend to discuss the merits of the so-called child-labor amendment, but its fate illustrates the fault which I believe exists in our system. It was submitted almost 13 years ago. It was submitted to the State legislatures for ratification. Since that time 38 States of the Union have at one time or another rejected it. More than three-fourths of the States of the Union have at one time or another since June 2, 1924, rejected the child-labor amendment. Still there was no decision, because rejection is not final in any State or in the Nation at large. There is no such thing as final rejection. Several of those 38 States have changed their minds from time to time and have since ratified the amendment. So that by today at one time or another 28 States have ratified it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. Was there any definite time limit on when this child-labor amendment should be ratified?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There was not.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the gentleman know what the twenty-eighth State was which ratified it? Was it not the State of Kansas?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Kansas, I believe. Kansas had rejected the child-labor amendment five times, and finally ratified on the sixth attempt.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman says there are no mechanics for that particular amendment; but the fact is that if a time limit is placed in the proposed amendment, the whole matter falls of its own accord if it is not ratified within the given time?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is my view.

Mr. DIRKSEN. And that would, of course, take care of the situation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That would take care of the situation, but I think it should be standardized so that there should be no mistake in the future. When the eighteenth amendment was proposed it carried a provision that if it was not ratified by the requisite three-fourths of the States within 7 years, it should be deemed to have been rejected.

I think the woman-suffrage amendment carried somewhat the same provision, although I am not certain. Members may be interested to know how long it takes on the average to ratify amendments. Twenty-one have been ratified since the beginning. The one with respect to which the most time was consumed was the so-called income tax, or sixteenth, amendment. With reference to that amendment, a period of 3 years, 6 months, and 5 days elapsed between submission by Congress and ratification by the 36 State legislatures. The shortest period elapsing in the case of ratification, strange to say, was the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. It took only 9 months and 15 days to do it. To be sure—and I happen to remember some instances in connection with it—it took us 14 years to reach that point, but only 9 months and 15 days to ratify it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Another amendment which was ratified in a short time was the so-called "lame duck" amendment, which took 11 months and 4 days.

Counting all the 21 ratifications and grouping the first 10 in 1 unit, we find that the average time which has elapsed between submission and ratification is 1 year and 7 months.

I call that to the attention of the members of the committee, because we hear some proposals these days that we cannot submit amendments to the Constitution and have them ratified because it would take too long, and Government cannot wait. The average length of time has been 1 year and 7 months.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. If the majority of the people want to amend the Constitution, and if the Congress were to submit the resolution today, it could be amended within 90 days without any question of doubt.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. MICHENER. It must be remembered, of course, that in some States the legislatures do not meet even biennially. I think there is one or two in which that is the case.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are some States where the legislatures meet but once in 4 years.

Mr. MICHENER. I think they are all meeting now.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the majority of them meet every other year. Had an amendment to the Constitution been proposed this last January and had it met with an overwhelming public support in the States, there is not the slightest doubt that it could have been ratified just about as quickly as Congress could pass a doubtful act and get the Supreme Court to pass on it.

Mr. MICHENER. Quicker.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. Supplementing what the gentleman has said, I think the whole thing could be obviated by Congress merely providing in the amendment that it should be submitted to conventions called by the States within a specified time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That was the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois, and that is the purpose of my bill, although I would accomplish it in a little different way.

I do not know whether I have time to emphasize one phase of the question that appeals to me, but I shall try. Article V of the Constitution provides two alternative methods of submission. The Congress is to select which method shall be employed. An amendment may be submitted to the legislatures of the States or it may be submitted to conventions of the people called in the several States. I think a reading of the debates of the old, old days will lead one to the conclusion that the authors of the Constitution expected that all amendments that invited the people to surrender power to the Federal Government, to increase the power of the Federal Government, to make a change in the relationship between the sovereign States and the Federal Government, should be submitted to conventions of the people. Indeed, the original Constitution was submitted to conventions of the people in the 13 States, but for some reason or other since that time and down to the submission of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment Congress has always selected the legislatures as the ratifying agencies. I think it was a mistaken policy, but in any event the Congress has the right to choose which of the two it shall take.

We cannot bind future Congresses in this matter, but we can in a statute declare it the belief, as it were, of this particular Congress, that in the future unless the Congress otherwise decides, amendments shall be submitted to conventions of the people. We have demonstrated the effectiveness of this method in the matter of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. Many people said, "Oh, the country is too big; you cannot get the States to go along, you cannot get them to elect delegates to a State convention; it won't work." It worked quicker than anyone we have ever had. Less time elapsed in that case than in the case of any other amendment. The people of the States demonstrated their ability to rule themselves, their ability at self-government. Within 9 months and 15 days 48 State conventions were called, held, and decisions made without the slightest doubt but what those decisions en masse represented the will of the American people.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. Would not ratification by conventions have a tendency to eliminate any particular partisan feeling which might exist in the legislatures?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly it would. It will keep these amendments from becoming political footballs. The child-labor amendment, because of the way it has been handled, has become a political football, kicked around for 13 years back and forth, up hill and down dale. Thirty-eight States have rejected it and 28 have ratified it—an absurd picture.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the question is, How best may we standardize this thing and still leave a completely free decision to the States? As I stated a moment ago, I think as a matter of general policy we should use the conventions of the people in the States. An amendment of comparatively small importance, like the Norris amendment, which did nothing more than change the date of the inauguration of the President and the convening of the newly elected Congress, a purely mechanical change, could very well be sent to the legislatures for ratification; but an amendment like the child-labor amendment, which invites the people of the various States to surrender to the Federal Government an important power heretofore enjoyed by the States, should go to the people of the States that created the Constitution in the first instance.

Having gone to conventions of the people, it is within the power of the Congress to say in the statute that the convention called to ratify shall be composed of delegates elected at large in each State. That defends the process against the rotten borough system which exists in some States in the matter of electing delegates by districts. The delegates shall be elected at large in the State so the people of the entire State will have an equal say in the matter, and the decision then is the decision of the people of the State rather than a decision of the majority of the districts.

Unless another date is specified by the Congress, the delegates shall meet on the twenty-eighth day following their election, which allows plenty of time. The legislature of the State calls the convention. The delegates, when elected, must meet promptly thereafter and render the decision of the people of the State.

The delegates so chosen shall constitute a convention in the particular State to ratify or reject. Concurrence of a majority of the total number of delegates shall be necessary to a choice. It shall be the duty of each convention to provide for official notification of the Secretary of State of the United States.

There is nothing in our statutes today that provides how the State of Illinois or the State of New York shall notify anybody that it has ratified or rejected an amendment. It has grown up by a sort of custom. There is no standardization. My bill provides in this section that delegates shall be elected and the convention held in accordance with the laws of the State. Then any amendment hereafter proposed to the Constitution of the United States shall be deemed to have been ratified as a part of the Constitution when it has been ratified by three-quarters of the States within 5 years after the amendment is proposed, and not later, or shall be deemed to have been rejected and no longer capable of being ratified by a State when it has been rejected by more than one-fourth of the States. Then you have your decision in accordance with the clear mandate of the Constitution of the United States.

Today you cannot tell when you will have a decision. The members of this body are this afternoon wondering whether the New York Legislature sometime this week or next week, after 13 years of consideration, is going to ratify or not. If it does ratify, that ends the matter for New York. If it rejects, the matter is not ended for New York at all. It goes on and on and on.

As I said in my opening remarks, this is somewhat of a hobby of mine; and my friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER] reminded me the other day that there is a difference between a hobby and a horse. You can dismount from the horse. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. LUCE. Has the gentleman given any thought to the problem presented by the fact that there is good authority, although not convincing or complete authority, for the belief that when a State convention has assembled, it may not be confined to any one subject but will have full power, being the embodiment of the people of the State, to proceed with anything else which it chooses to take up, the result being in some States that they do not want redistricting changes in their constitution or other changes? Therefore a convention is strongly opposed by a substantial number of the people under any circumstances.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman from Massachusetts brings up the question that a convention called in a State for the purpose of passing upon an amendment to the Federal Constitution, having disposed of that business, might go on with State business.

Mr. LUCE. It is not a new question. It has been threshed over in various States from time to time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, the Federal Government would not have jurisdiction over that end of it. I might cite the example of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, when 48 States called conventions, elected delegates, and each State with perfect good order reached a prompt decision. That decision was recognized and accepted by the people of all America.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. PHILLIPS. What would the gentleman's suggestion be about disposing of the pending amendments which he told us about in such interesting fashion?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Nothing can be done about that. My bill is not retroactive, and we cannot make it retroactive. Those amendments that are now pending are not in the possession or jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States. They are out there somewhere in 48 legislatures, and they will stay in each legislature until the legislature ratifies.

Mr. PHILLIPS. How about the constitutional amendments?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are constitutional amendments. Does the gentleman mean a constitutional amendment to withdraw all the old trash?

Mr. PHILLIPS. My point is if another constitutional amendment should be submitted, why should it not include pending amendments?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not advocating a constitutional amendment. I am advocating the passage of a statute by which the Congress of the United States can exercise its undoubted power to regulate the manner in which the States shall perform their Federal functions in connection with amendments. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to use to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON].

FEDERAL SALES TAX ON GASOLINE AND LUBRICATING OIL

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, Congress should, at the earliest moment, repeal the present Federal sales tax on gasoline and lubricating oil, since these are inequitable and unreasonably burdensome.

I do not believe there is any other tax concerning which a committee from either branch of Congress has frankly admitted that it was objectionable and should be repealed. This is the case with the Federal sales tax on gasoline. Originally levied in 1932 as a temporary measure, it has been continued and even, for a brief period, increased. On May 10, 1933, the Senate Finance Committee in its favorable report on continuance of this tax, made this assertion:

> Your committee is of the opinion that the gasoline tax should be reserved for the States after June 30, 1934.

There was every ground, Mr. Chairman, for that declaration. Before the Federal tax was laid, every State in the Union and the District of Columbia had its own gasoline sales tax. In spite of that admission, the same committee in 1935 recommended that the tax be continued, grouping it with other taxes, and declaring:

> In conclusion, your committee, while recognizing that many of these taxes are objectionable or contain objectionable features, strongly urges that these taxes be temporarily extended for a period of 2 years without a change. Action on the part of the Congress to remove these taxes at an earlier date or to revise same will not be foreclosed by the passage of this joint resolution. Since the majority of these temporary revenue laws will cease to be operative after June 30, 1935, unless this joint resolution becomes law before that date, the prompt consideration of this measure is also urged by your committee.

It was also a clear recognition that by imposing this tax the Federal Government was invading a taxation field which it recognized as properly belonging to the States.

In many States this gasoline tax now constitutes the most important single source of revenue. In Arkansas, Florida, and Georgia approximately 50 percent of all tax revenues comes from the gasoline sales tax. In North Carolina, Tennessee, and Texas about 30 percent is thus derived. Many States have even pledged their expected future receipts from the gasoline tax for payment of interest and bonds. West Virginia thus has pledged 83 percent of all State gasoline tax collection for debt service on highway bonds. Arkansas pledges 65 percent, South Carolina 58 percent, North Carolina 49 percent, and Florida 43 percent. The Federal tax, therefore, because of its effect upon the consumption of gasoline, adversely affects the expected income of the various States.

This question of the effect of double taxation has been noted by Congress. The Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives authorized in July 1932 the appointment of a special committee to study this whole question of double taxation. In the preliminary report transmitted to that committee by Chairman VINSON of Kentucky these comments were made:

> If gasoline is classified as a necessity, as undoubtedly it must be in many cases, then the tax burden is unprecedentedly high for a necessity.
> * * * Combined Federal, State, and local levies upon gasoline increase the sales price to the consumer from 30 percent to more than 100 percent, depending upon the State involved. This is a large percentage, and while the tax is productive and easy to collect, it is evident that the rates are approaching the point of diminishing returns. * * *
>
> A discussion of the tax which gasoline can fairly bear without materially reducing its consumption is one of the important matters deserving the attention of both Federal and State legislators.

With specific reference to the Federal gasoline tax the committee pointed out:

> Prior to 1932 every State in the Union, the Territory of Hawaii, and the District of Columbia imposed a tax upon gasoline. On June 21, 1932, the Federal Government entered the field with a 1-cent tax upon gasoline sold by producers or importers during the period June 21, 1932, to June 30, 1933. While the Federal tax is a temporary measure, there is a possibility that it may be extended into 1934 or later years.

The Interstate Commission on Conflicting Taxation, at a meeting held May 24 and 25, 1933, made the following recommendation:

> Gasoline taxes: Since Congress has declared that the Federal tax on gasoline was levied only as a temporary expedient on account of the emergency, the Commission urges the Federal Government to relinquish this source of revenue for the exclusive use of the States at the end of the next Federal fiscal year.

The continuance of this Federal sales tax seemingly is justified by its supporters solely on the ground that it produces revenue and not upon the ground that there is a sound principle underlying it. Federal sales taxes have been consistently rejected. If gasoline and lubricating oil were only one of a large group of articles in common use which were subjected to a Federal tax, it might then appear that the theory of a Federal sales tax was approved. This, however, has not been the case. On the contrary, these petroleum products seem to be singled out merely because of the ease of the collection and the large revenues thus received.

The petroleum industry has been carrying an unusual tax burden. Both the number and the amount of these taxes have been variously estimated. It seems accepted by the best authorities that there are now over 70 special taxes levied on the oil industry alone and that there are over 130 general taxes which are levied on the industry, many of them falling also upon others.

Since, ultimately, the consuming public pays these taxes, it might be more accurate to point out that the motoring public is today carrying this tremendous tax burden. From 1919 to 1935, a period of 16 years, motorists have paid over $12,000,000,000 in taxes. It has been estimated by the National Industrial Conference that the 1935 tax bill of the whole country amounted to $9,650,000,000. Over 13 percent of all these taxes was paid by the motorists. Of the State taxes collected in the 48 States, 32 percent is from gasoline taxes paid by the motorists.

These heavy taxes are largely paid by those who are in the lower income brackets. The Department of Commerce has published Consumers' Use of Selected Goods and Services by Income Classes, showing that 88 percent of all cars were purchased by families with incomes less than $3,000 per year and 71.3 percent by families receiving less than $2,000 per year. Under the theory that taxes should be levied upon the basis of the ability to pay, it sees inequitable that groups who are exempted from payment of income taxes on the theory that they are not able to pay should be the very ones upon whom falls probably the largest amount and the heaviest burden of these gasoline and lubricating-oil sales taxes.

Improper or inequitable laws inevitably create disrespect for law, evasion of law, and corruption. We have found this sadly true in more than one instance in the past. It is true also in the matter of sales taxes on gasoline. The bootlegging of gasoline which has not paid the tax has created serious problems in a number of States. The border line between a State having a high tax and a State having a low tax naturally invites gasoline bootlegging. This has been true in my own State. Kansas had a 3-cent State gasoline tax rate. Missouri had a 2-cent rate. Oklahoma had a 4-cent rate. Arkansas had a 6½-cent rate. A very profitable trade soon developed, the gasoline for the State with the lower tax rate being bootlegged into the neighboring States whose taxes were higher. This meant a very definite loss of much revenue to the States where the bootlegged product was sold.

In this matter it has been remarked by more than one that in this evasion of gasoline taxes those who are guilty of the practice are following the example of the governments themselves, which, having originally declared that the purpose of gasoline taxes was maintenance of highways, then diverted it to other purposes.

Mr. Chairman, this Federal sales tax on gasoline and lubricating oil affects rather vitally two outstanding industries which have been in the front rank of those leading the way back to prosperity. The petroleum industry and the automobile industry have been pacemakers for the rest of our industrial world. The levy of this tax which is ultimately paid by the consumers of petroleum products and the users of the products of the automobile industry is bound to affect the purchase and use of the products of these two phases of the Nation's business. Various studies which have been made of the effect of an increased or a decreased State gasoline tax upon the consumption of gasoline products have revealed that if the tax goes up per car consumption decreases and if the tax goes down per car consumption increases. Since persons of less than moderate means constitute the largest number of automobile users, it seems likely, although it has not been demonstrated, that the automobile industry may also feel the effects of the increased cost of maintaining an automobile due in part to the Federal gasoline tax.

The farmers constitute a large section of these gasoline users in the low-income groups. According to the Department of Agriculture, 22 percent of the motor vehicles in the country are owned on farms. The average consumption of motor fuel by farm vehicles is estimated at 565.6 gallons. That means that farmers are being compelled to contribute approximately $28,400,000 annually in Federal gasoline sales taxes. In view of the fact that the Bureau of Agricultural Economics finds that the average gross income of farm owners of automobiles is less than $1,500 annually, this tax is probably one of the most burdensome which could be devised for this group. In view of the condition in which so many of the farmers of the Nation find themselves, the injustice and the impropriety of this tax, of which nearly one-fourth is paid by the farmers, seems self-evident.

No one, Mr. Chairman, would propose that a Federal sales tax should be levied upon hay or grain sold to farmers for consumption by their horses which formerly furnished the automotive power on the farm. Nevertheless, the farmer's tractor and his stationary engine which is the modern substitute for the horse obliges the farmer to pay the Federal gasoline sales tax upon all of the motor fuel which is used for this necessary machinery on the farm. While the Nation labors to increase the farmer's purchasing power, it seems to be even more effectively laboring to take from him $28,000,000 of that reduced purchasing power.

These Federal sales taxes on gasoline and lubricating oil are unusual in that this form of tax is customarily levied on luxuries rather than necessities. Among the commodities which have this type of tax are tobacco, liquor, playing cards, and other articles which are not in common use by the great body of the American people. Gasoline and lubricating oil do not belong in the same category with these products. This is preeminently a motor age. The great body of our people rely upon transportation by automobile or bus. Motors not only drive pleasure cars but are in constant use as part of our transportation system. The tax upon motor fuel in reality is a tax levied upon transportation. It is, therefore, a tax also upon distribution. This might be subject to more than usual criticism, since one of our most significant economic efforts today is to promote distribution of our products.

The tax upon lubricating oil is levied upon our farming and industrial interests as well as upon those who may use motor cars for pleasure or luxury. All our machinery requires lubrication. Without the convenient and effective type of lubrication supplied by petroleum products we would be forced to rely upon less satisfactory methods. This tax might then practically qualify as a tax laid upon manufacture. Into that same category would fall the farmer's use of lubricants on his tractors and other types of farm machinery.

The industrial use of lubricating oil constitutes 43 percent of the total consumption. According to the Interstate Commerce Commission railways of class 1 alone purchased $13,545,000 worth of lubricating oils and closely allied products, using approximately 84,093,750 gallons upon which they paid a Federal sales tax of approximately $3,363,750, or about 11.7 percent of the total revenue derived from this tax. Motor vehicles operated by industrial and commercial companies, according to a study made in 1931 by the United States Bureau of Mines, use 26 percent of all lubricating oils.

The lubricating oil tax ranges from 4 percent to 33 percent of the sales price of the product when that sells for 25 cents per quart down as low as 12 cents per gallon.

The total revenues returned from the Federal sales tax on lubricating oil total approximately $27,000,000, a very minor portion of the Federal Government's income.

Since these taxes would appear to be inequitable, discriminatory, and burdensome, Mr. Chairman, it is to be hoped that the Congress will seriously consider whether their discontinuance would not be of greater advantage than their reenactment. It seems quite probable that if these levies are abandoned, industrial recovery will be advanced and the additional Federal revenues received from other taxes, due to this promotion of recovery, would compensate either wholly or largely for the elimination of taxes which it was hard to justify.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to use to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAMNECK].

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, the Supreme Court controversy is the most important issue that has confronted the country since the Civil War.

Efforts are being made to becloud the issue by injecting politics. I want it clearly understood that I am a Democrat; that I loyally supported Mr. Roosevelt in both of his campaigns for the Presidency; that I will continue to support him when I think he is right; but that I will oppose any effort to rob the people of the liberties and rights that have been so dearly gained. The question is not whether we shall or shall not support the President but whether we shall do it within the framework of the Constitution. Since the almost total surrender by Congress of its power to the Executive, the Supreme Court remains the last bulwark of the people's rights.

Let us look back in history and note the struggles of the people to gain these rights. In ancient Rome the common people once left the city and refused to come back unless they were given written laws to protect their liberties. The freemen of England defeated the forces of King John and forced him to sign the Magna Carta—the bill of rights upon which Anglo-Saxon law is based. The Puritans sailed the then unknown Atlantic to find a place where they could enjoy the right to worship God as they saw fit. The history of the Colonies is a history of the struggle of people for the right to govern themselves. Franklin, Jefferson, and the other signers of the Declaration of Independence pledged their lives, fortunes, and sacred honor in support of the Declaration, but it took 7 long years of bloodshed and suffering to make independence a fact.

The people who have emigrated to America have come here seeking the free exercise of rights denied them in their own countries. The French Huguenots came here seeking the right to worship as they pleased—and found that right. The Irish fled their homeland because they could enjoy here the right of self-government. The subject people of Austria and Russia found in America that freedom denied them in their own lands. Many people came to this country from Germany shortly after the failure of the revolution of 1848, in which the German people rose against the ruling class and demanded their rights. After putting down the revolution the rulers of Germany became increasingly oppressive and hundreds of thousands of the common people emigrated to other lands, the greater number to America.

Up to the present time the American people have continuously fought for, and succeeded in adding to, their rights. Will it be said that in 1937 the tide turned and they commenced to lose them? Will the tide of freedom-seeking emigrants turn the other way? Will Americans have to leave their own country to seek their rights? I trust not.

To find the reason why the framers of our Constitution deliberately divided the powers of the Government into three branches, we must first know the conditions as they existed prior to its adoption. The colonists had suffered from unchecked power in the hands of one man, George III. This British King controlled the Parliament and appointed and controlled the judges. The wise fathers of our country decided that they would not allow such a thing to happen in America. They gave the power of making laws to Congress, the power of interpreting the laws to the courts, and the power of executing the laws to the President. They did this deliberately, so that no one man or group could centralize the power.

Let us see what former Presidents have said on this aggrandizement of power in the hands of one man. Washington, in his Farewell Address, said:

> The spirit of encroachments tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism.

Washington said further:

> If in the opinion of the people the distribution of constitutional power be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment, but let there be no change by usurpation.

Our fourth President, James Madison, wrote:

> The accumulation of all powers—legislative, executive, and judiciary—in the same hands, whether of one, a few, or many, and whether hereditary, self-appointed, or elective, may justly be pronounced the very definition of tyranny.

Supporters of the President's proposal speak of a "mandate" given the President because of his overwhelming majority. Throughout his entire campaign the President spoke not a word about this proposed change. The Democratic national platform states:

> If problems cannot be effectively solved by legislation within the Constitution, we shall seek such clarifying amendments as will assure * * * power to enact these laws which * * * we * * * shall find necessary. Thus we propose to maintain the letter and spirit of the Constitution.

Every Congressman, every President, must take a solemn oath to "preserve, protect, and defend" the Constitution. Undermining the Supreme Court in order to shove unconstitutional legislation down the throats of the people is as much a violation of this oath as it would be to tear the Constitution to shreds.

We have recently had a case of an executive undermining the judiciary in Michigan. Some automobile workers went on a strike and seized the factory of their employers. They comprised a very small minority of the total number of workers, but because of their key position they threw 10 times their number out of work. The factory owner sought and received an injunction—the court ordering the men out of the factory. The men refused to go; and when the sheriff reported to the Governor that he did not have sufficient men to evict the strikers, but that the nonstriking workers were about to evict them, the Governor had the National Guard surround the factory to protect the strikers in their illegal act.

This Governor, who is said to have White House ambitions, also took an oath to preserve, protect, and defend the constitution and faithfully execute the laws of the State of Michigan.

The right to enjoy one's property is a part of the Bill of Rights; and if the workers seize other people's property, how long can they be sure that their own property will be safe from seizure? I believe it was Lincoln who said, in effect, "Do not destroy your neighbor's house, lest your own house be destroyed."

Do not mistake me—I am a friend of labor. I believe the worker has the right to bargain collectively or individually as he chooses, to work if he chooses, quit when he chooses, and go on strike when he chooses.

Would-be dictators always incite the worker, recount the sufferings of the people, and then explain that in order to correct these conditions they must give up rights and powers. Once in possession of this power the dictator is no longer a would-be, but a reality. The people find that the silken threads have turned to chains, and that the long struggle to regain their lost rights has again begun.

Take Italy for example: Mussolini has placed Italy back on its feet, but at the cost of the people's rights. You are either in favor of the Fascist Government, or you are in jail. Germany is another example; Hitler has improved things in a material way but at the cost of free speech and free press. In Russia, anyone who has a different opinion from the ruling clique is liable to find himself soon before a firing squad.

Let us see what happens to groups in dictator-controlled nations. In Russia, there is no such thing as freedom of religion. In Germany, the Nazis are in constant warfare with both the Catholic Church and the Protestants. In Mexico a young girl suffers death for attending a religious ceremony in defiance of the law. In Italy the Masonic order is suppressed. In Germany the Jews are oppressed and have suffered the loss of their rights. Labor has suffered the loss of its rights in both Italy and Germany.

The people of these countries once had the rights we now enjoy but were careless of them. They do not have them now. They cannot worship God as they please, or speak according to their conscience, or participate in the affairs of their governments. These people can give Americans the answer to the question of what can happen to a nation that grows indifferent toward liberty. They lose it. And once lost, the reclaiming of liberty may be vastly more difficult, more bloody, and more tragic than the original winning of it.

These rights have been regarded by our ancestors as so precious that they have suffered untold hardships, and have even given up their lives to gain and preserve them. Are we to sit supinely by and see them taken away? Shall the sufferings, sacrifices, and struggles of our patriots have been in vain? Just as the fathers of our country dedicated their lives and fortunes to making America free, it is for us, the living, to dedicate our lives to keeping it free. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

In a world given over to one-man governments, the President has stood out as the defender of democracy—has made numerous speeches advocating that we Americans should prove to the world that "democracy will work." Can this be the same man that, controlling the legislative branch of the government, now seeks to gain control of the judiciary? Do we want a one-man government; no matter how benevolent?

I do not believe that Franklin Roosevelt has dictatorial ambitions; but we must remember that the term of Presidents is limited and that some other man in the White House might use the combined executive, legislative, judicial power to the detriment of the people and not to their advantage. I do not believe that the President now has any intention of taking away the liberties of our people; but I would like to make it clear to you that the Supreme Court is the last guardian of your rights. If you allow the Court to be packed today, you are liable to find that your liberties have vanished tomorrow.

An appeal is being made to the farmers to support the President in his demand. They are being told that the only way to give them the legislative aid they desire is this judiciary change. They are not told that this is the beginning of the probable loss of their rights—the right to plant what they want, when they please, and to sell their produce where they please—the right actually to hold property, the right of free speech. Are the farmers willing to risk losing their rights and independence for a small yearly soil-erosion or crop-curtailment check? Are they willing to sell their birthright for a mess of pottage?

The graveyard of the Democratic Party is strewn with the remains of Congressmen who, following the dictates of their conscience and the interests of their constituents, dared to vote against some of the administration's proposals. The Democratic Party will probably find itself in the graveyard if it allows itself to be known as the party that surrendered the hard-won rights of the American people.

The United States has done well under our present form of constitutional government. We have grown from 13 sparsely settled States with a population of 3,000,000 to a great Nation, spanning the continent, with a population of 130,000,000 and a standard of living the highest the world has ever known. The authors of the Declaration of Independence said:

> Prudence indeed will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes.

If we feel the need of a change in our form of government, we should remember that the Constitution provides for such a change by amendment. Opponents of the proposal to submit the issue to the people claim that it would take too long. This argument lacks force by reason of the fact that the prohibition repeal amendment was adopted a few short months after the people had been given the opportunity to vote on it. You can trust the American people. They have uncommonly good common sense. If we are to have a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, then we must let the people have final say on important changes in the structure of the Government.

In conclusion, my fellow citizens, I again warn you that eternal vigilence is the price of liberty; and I appeal to you to make your wishes on this most important issue known to your servants in Congress. Let us keep our liberties intact, place patriotism above politics, and fritter not away for a momentary good the hard-won values of centuries of endeavor.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER].

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to consume the 10 minutes. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] said that he was speaking in a reminiscent mood, saying he had discussed this same matter for a number of years, and this recalled to my mind another matter that is of vital importance today, I believe, which I have discussed in other years.

In the heyday of 1926–29 I discussed on the floor of the House the question of credit inflation. I was violently opposed to unwarranted installment buying—credit inflation in its worst form. Now, we are coming out of the depression and we are again getting into the old habit. If you will listen to your radio any morning between 7 and 8 o'clock in Washington you will find that almost all the time is taken up with sales talks—talk like this: "Buy our system of liquid heating; have it installed in your house today; no down payment; payments begin in September; enjoy the modern heat now."

Of course, you must own your own home and the lien attaches and you must pay later.

Another one, "Buy anything in this store for $1 down; you enjoy the merchandise; pay when you get ready and let us do the worrying."

The capsheaf was called to my attention by an article in the papers a day or two ago. Of course, we all realize it is necessary and advisable to buy necessities on the installment plan. When we buy the home, when we buy the things that are necessary, we sometimes must get trusted, but I do not believe that ever before in the history of the Republic political banquets have been paid for on the installment plan. [Laughter.]

In the District of Columbia the Democrats are holding two groups of banquets this evening—the minor and the major. The minor banquet is to be under the auspices of the Young Democrats, and the First Lady of the land is to be the star attraction. The major banquet is to be at the Mayflower, and the President of the United States is to be the main attraction.

We are advised by the press that Democratic Government clerks who are on the Federal pay roll and who hold jobs under the Government are expected to attend.

This is not the exact language, but this is the only inference that can be drawn. They are expected to attend and the terms of payment are what I am interested in. The first payment was $5 down in cash on Federal pay day last Monday, according to the statement of the organization responsible for the banquets, and then these poor clerks, who are expected to attend and pay $10 for the privilege of sitting and listening, are to have $5 taken out of their next pay-day check. This is the minor banquet. Then for the major banquet, many of our friends on the other side of the aisle—who are now smiling and who are expected to attend—the price is to be $100 a plate and to be in good standing you are expected to be there. This is a case where deserving Democrats are taxed according to their ability to pay and if they do not have the cash they are to have the privilege of the installment plan; in other words, Government employees and you officials who cannot raise the $100 to perform your duty in celebrating your recent victory, are to be permitted to pay $25 down and then $25 each monthly pay day, as the Government pays you, until you have taken care of your installment banquet. This is compulsory credit inflation with a vengeance.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Not now; I have not the time.

Another thing that is interesting about this credit innovation is that its purpose is to liquidate the debt of the Democratic National Committee. You know when the Republicans were in power, after 1918, we found a colossal debt facing the people and it became our duty, as we conceived it, to pay off that debt and to reduce that debt and take the old mortgage off of our national farm, and we proceeded to do this. We did it, as the good Speaker who now faces me, will recall—and I think he went along and helped—by reducing the national debt by one billion dollars a year for 10 years.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield, inasmuch as he has referred to me?

Mr. MICHENER. To the Speaker, always.

Mr. BANKHEAD. We paid it off in installments, did we not? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; that is just the point, Mr. Speaker. We paid it off in installments, but we paid it off, and did not refinance it or leave the burden on someone else to pay. While we paid it off in installments—listen, Mr. Chairman—we extinguished the debt. We did not just change the form of the obligation. After these banquets the Democratic National Committee will be relieved, but those compelled to pay on the installment plan must pay in the future.

So tonight these banquets, we are told, are for the purpose of paying off the national Democratic debt of over $300,000. And I again call the attention of our splendid Speaker and of the House to the fact that these banquets are not paying off that national debt tonight, they are refinancing it, you are taking the burden off the shoulders of the National Democratic Party and placing that burden on the shoulders of Tom, Dick, and Harry, "deserving Democrats", who, in Washington at least, happen to hold many of their jobs because they are Democratic Party appointees.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Oh, I could not resist yielding to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Do I understand that the lamentations of my good friend from Michigan come from the fact that certain things that have happened do not permit him to enjoy a victory dinner tonight?

Mr. MICHENER. Of course, I regret that the Republicans were not victorious, however. I was offered a ticket. I could not afford $100 to go to a Democratic banquet, and I have too good sense to borrow the $100 for so useless a purpose, and I am not on the Democratic pay roll as an employee, and therefore I cannot be compelled to buy a $100 ticket and pay $25 down.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. And that is the reason the gentleman is in his present frame of mind?

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman is opposed to unnecessary installment buying except for things worth-while. I am in my present frame of mind because I am opposed to the principle of credit inflation when it comes to making $1,200 clerks kick in for a banquet to pay off the debt of a political party. Just think how those poor clerks will enjoy that "victory dinner", which must be paid for out of future pay checks. This policy is setting a very bad example. I made a speech here along in the twenties against installment buying.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. MICHENER. Because of that speech I was taken to task by one of the factories in my own State that happened to be selling automobiles at $5 down and the rest when you get ready. I said then that we must pay some time. Undoubtedly that kind of buying contributed much to the depression. Now we have a new and most insidious form of spending for useless and nonproductive things. You cannot enjoy just because you can borrow. The pay day is coming. You must eventually pay for all of these things, and I say in conclusion that it would be far better for our good friends now in power, my good Democratic friends, if they paid off their national party debt incurred during the last campaign, without imposing upon the Government clerks in Washington and asking them to take $10 or $100 tickets which they cannot afford to take—and when I say cannot afford to take, I say that no employee of the Government can afford to pay $10 or $100 for the privilege of sitting in a Democratic hallelujah meeting, if he has to go in debt for the privilege. The same would be true if these were Republican meetings.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; I yield to the former Governor of Oregon.

Mr. PIERCE. Speaking of paying off the debt when the Republicans were in power, did that pertain to the last years of the Hoover administration?

Mr. MICHENER. I think the gentleman must have misunderstood me. I did not make any such statement.

Mr. PIERCE. I understood the gentleman to say they paid off the debt at the rate of a billion dollars a year while the Republicans were in power.

Mr. MICHENER. Oh, the gentleman refers to the reduction of the national debt from $26,000,000,000 in 1919 down to $16,000,000,000 in 1930.

Mr. PIERCE. And then tell us about the last years of the Hoover administration. What happened then? Did not that administration increase the national debt three or four billion dollars?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; there was some increase.

Mr. PIERCE. And is it not true that no administration could have gone through the last 4 years without getting in debt, with the tremendous unemployment we had in this country, just as it was going into debt under the Hoover administration?

Mr. MICHENER. In all fairness, we were in a depression, we were in a slump; it was a world-wide depression; we were in the morning after the night before, and let us be frank about it. We had expanded credit. We had been on a spending spree after the war. The philosophy was to spend, not to save. We had done just the thing that I am inveighing against now.

We do not want a make-believe prosperity which, in fact, is not prosperity at all. Economy must in the end be the basis of lasting prosperty. You will read in the press tomorrow of the amount of party debt paid off by these $10 minor, $100 major banquets, but remember that the poor party job-holders who cannot afford to pay cash will still owe the debt. Banquets, fur coats, and automobiles are fine when we can afford them. Because our National Government is spending $2 for every $1 of income is no measuring stick for the rest of us. The pay day or the bankruptcy court is the inevitable end. It is all right to pay off political party debts by selling tickets to banquets, and by the same token it is all wrong to sell the tickets to those who cannot afford it, and who must mortgage next month's pay check, which is needed to buy things for the family.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. If that is true, it is unfortunate, of course, that we have to take the money from the clerks, but we do not have any Liberty Leagues on our side.

Mr. MICHENER. Of course it is unfortunate to coerce the employees, and I am so glad the gentleman agrees with me that it is unfortunate. I would that he could bring this same feeling to the chairman of the Democratic National Committee. I am sure that my good Democrat friend the gentleman from Kansas would like to avoid these assessments of clerks, and in this particular we agree exactly. [Laughter and applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLANNAGAN].

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to talk to you about the President's message on reformation of the Federal judiciary. In doing this I want to brush the rubbish aside, chloroform the spirit of hysteria that special privilege has turned loose in the land, and deal with the subject in a practical and sensible manner.

To begin with, I want to admit that I am not a constitutional lawyer in the sense of those who make a study of our fundamental law for the one and sole purpose of curbing human rights and shielding and protecting the property rights they may happen to represent, though I believe I know a great deal more about the true meaning and intent of the Constitution than these special pleaders.

And in the beginning I want to observe that charging me with trying to put a dictator in the White House, with attempting to overthrow our form of government, with preaching fascism or communism or any other kind of ism, will neither deaden my energies nor quiet my voice in my effort to uphold the hand of our President in the great fight he is waging in behalf of greater social and economic rights for the masses of America. My family history on both sides of the house is too deeply rooted in American soil for such base and slimy charges to affect my standing as an American.

Long before we ever thought of a constitution, though I believe the spirit of the constitution at the time was indelibly written upon their hearts and minds, my people fled from the tyrannies and oppressions of the Old World to find freedom in the bosom of the new. Long before we ever had a constitution my people staked their all on the altar of freedom, joined hands with the other colonists, and together they triumphed over the proud mistress of the sea, landed our country safely into national existence, and paved the way for the Constitution I love and revere. No one can charge that there is a drop of Tory blood in my people or that they ever refused to rally around the stars and stripes.

I make these preliminary observations to serve notice upon those who would impugn my motives that I brand any statement that I am not preaching Americanism, as I understand Americanism, as the ordinary American understands Americanism, the essence of which is freedom, freedom of conscience, political freedom, religious freedom, economic freedom, that governments derive their just power from the consent of the governed, equal rights to all, special privilege to none, as a dastardly slander circulated for the purpose of destroying that which they cannot answer.

I know that there are those who will not agree with the views I express. Some of them are my close friends, for whom I entertain the highest respect. In taking a contrary stand, I know that they are motivated by sincere and honest convictions. With them I have no quarrel. I only ask that they accord me the same right to express my honest and sincere convictions that I so freely accord them. And for them I pray that a kind Providence may open their eyes and let them look down the avenue of the years and see just what our national fate will be if we continue to live under a judicial oligarchy instead of a democracy of the people, by the people, and for the people.

And there are those who, I am persuaded, for base and sinister motives, are against the views I express, because they are the hirelings of the Bourbon-Tory class that exalt property rights and frown upon the recognition of the economic and social rights the masses in America, under the leadership of our great President, are today battling for. To them I say that it is written a haughty spirit goeth before a fall, and that they had better call a halt and use the compass of public opinion to see which way they are headed before they become the contrivers of their own ruin.

SOME THINGS TO KEEP IN MIND IN CONSIDERING THE PLAN

Before discussing the President's reorganization plan of the Federal judiciary let me first make a few observations which I hope you will keep in mind as we consider and analyze the plan.

(A) Constitutionality of act often hinges on economic and social views of judges

Judges are human. As human beings they have their likes and dislikes; they hold economic views, entertain opinions on social problems, and rarely, if ever, become political nonentities.

These likes and dislikes, economic views, social opinions, and political leanings depend, to a great extent, upon the judge's background. From what section did he spring, in what atmosphere was he reared, who were his associates, what business and professional connections did he have before being elevated to the bench? Answer these questions and you know pretty well how the judge is going to view a case involving some social or economic problem.

If John Doe, a reactionary, is elevated to the bench, putting a prefix before his name, and calling him Judge John Doe, and robing him in a black gown will not in any way change his social, economic, and political views. He is still the same old John Doe entertaining the same old social, economic, and political views. In other words, putting a man in the Supreme Court does not mean that he has been reborn or regenerated, that henceforth he is a new man, capable of forgetting his past views on social, economic, and political questions, and in considering cases involving such questions will not let his past views and prejudices influence him, consciously or unconsciously, in construing the Constitution.

These 4-and-5 and 3-and-6 decisions we have frequently had in cases involving great social and economic problems clearly indicate, to my mind, that what I have said is true and that the trouble is not with the Constitution but with the judges themselves. It is generally known what the social and economic views entertained by the respective members of the Court are. Before going on the bench they were usually strong, outstanding men of conviction, entertaining definite and fixed opinions on most of the social, economic, and political problems. Their views are generally so well known that practically any layman, upon being informed of the social or economic question involved, can tell you how the Court will stand on the decision. This clearly shows that the judges in considering the case look at the constitutional question involved not dispassionately and with open minds but through the economic and social glasses they have been wearing since they became old enough to form definite and fixed opinions. I am not criticizing them for this, because they are only human, and that is the way human beings, consciously or unconsciously, act.

Now, do not become alarmed over the views I have expressed, because I can cite respectable authority to sustain them. Why, I can prove the truthfulness of these views by the Supreme Court judges themselves.

Let the record speak.

Chief Justice Hughes on one occasion observed: "We are under a Constitution, but the Constitution is what judges say it is."

The great Chief Justice in this frank observation is only partially correct. Recent decisions show that sometimes, at least, it is only what five of the nine judges say it is.

In the Butler case (297 U. S. 1), which hinged upon the constitutionality of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, commonly known as the A. A. A., Justice Stone, in a dissenting opinion, which was joined in by Justices Brandeis and Cardozo, said:

> Courts are concerned only with the power to enact statutes, not with their wisdom. * * * For the removal of unwise laws from the statute books, appeal lies not to the courts but to the ballot and to the processes of democratic government. * * * The suggestion that it (the taxing power of Congress) must now be curtailed by judicial fiat because it may be abused by unwise use hardly rises to the dignity of argument. * * * Courts are not the only agency of government that must be assumed to have capacity to govern.

Which clearly shows that he thought the majority opinion was based upon fixed economic views and not because the Agricultural Adjustment Act contravened the Constitution.

Justice Harlan, in the case of United States v. Harris (106 U. S. 629), in his dissenting opinion, made the same indictment against the Court:

> It is for Congress, not the judiciary, to say what legislation is appropriate. * * * The judiciary may not, with safety to our institutions, enter the domain of legislative discretion and dictate the means which Congress shall employ in the exercise of its granted power.

Chief Justice Taft, in the celebrated Adkins case (261 U. S. 525), which involved a minimum-wage law for the District of Columbia, in a dissenting opinion upholding the constitutionality of the statute, said:

> It is not the function of this Court to hold congressional acts invalid simply because they are passed to carry out economic views which the Court believes to be unwise or unsound.

Would it be possible to make a more clear-cut charge that the Court, in holding the act in question unconstitutional, did so not because the act contravened the Constitution but because the act promulgated economic views not entertained by a majority of the members of the Court?

Let me call just one more witness. He has already testified, but as he is so positive about the matter, permit me to recall him for further examination.

In 1933 New York State passed a minimum-wage statute based upon the Standard bill of the National Consumers' League, which attempted to meet the objections of the Supreme Court raised in the Adkins case. The act was tested and finally found its way to the Supreme Court (Morehead v. New York, 298 U. S. 587), which, on June 1, 1936, held the act unconstitutional. Justice Stone, upholding the constitutionality of the act in a dissenting opinion, said:

> It is difficult to imagine any grounds, other than our own personal economic predilections, for saying that the contract of employment is any the less an appropriate subject of legislation than are scores of others, in dealing with which the Court has held that legislatures may curtail individual freedom in the public interest.

(B) The Constitution flexible enough to permit economic and social views of judges to determine decisions

Another thing we should keep in mind in considering the President's plan is that the Constitution is not a legal code spelling out in minute detail, thou shalt or thou shalt not do this or that. It is a declaration of fundamental governmental principles stated in broad and general terms. It was necessary, in order to perpetuate our Government, that broad and general terms be used so that the legislative branch of our Government, from time to time, can, by appropriate legislation, keep abreast with the thought and development of the times. It was worded so as to be flexible enough to meet changed conditions. This flexibility ofttimes permits the economic and social views of the judges to determine decisions.

Chief Justice Marshall said that the Constitution was—> • • • intended to endure for ages to come, and consequently to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs.

Justice Story said:

> • • • The Constitution inevitably deals in general language. • • • Hence its powers are expressed in general terms leaving to the legislature, from time to time, to adopt its own means to effectuate legitimate objects, and to mold and model the exercise of its power, as its own wisdom and public interest shall require.

Now the legislative branch of our Government, most of the Members being fresh from the people, has usually realized that we live in a changing world and that in order to promote the general welfare of the people it is necessary that laws be passed, from time to time, to meet our changed social and economic conditions. The trouble has usually been caused by the social and economic views of many of the judges remaining static. From our past history it would seem that the social and economic views of many of our judges, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, changeth not.

(C) No check on judiciary

Now, just one other thing I want you to keep in mind in considering the President's plan of reorganization of the Federal judiciary:

Our Government is supposed to be a government of checks and balances, divided into three great divisions—the Executive, the legislative, and the judicial. As a practical proposition this assumption is only two-thirds correct.

The executive can be checked by the legislative branch, by the judicial branch, and by the people.

The legislative can be checked by the executive branch, by the judicial branch, and by the people.

But who checks the judicial branch? As a practical proposition, no one. They hold office during good behavior, which means they hold on until worn out by old age or infirmities, and their salaries cannot be diminished during their term of office.

Let me give you respectable Supreme Court authority for the proposition that there is no check on the judicial branch of our Government.

In the Butler case, involving the constitutionality of the A. A. A. legislation, Justice Stone frankly admitted that—

> The only check upon our exercise of power is our own sense of self-restraint.

Most of the maladjustments that we find in our social and economic life today are, in my opinion, due to the fact that under our system of government there is no effective way of checking the Supreme Court.

The judiciary has over the years, little by little, usurped Executive power, legislative power; yes, the very power of a free and independent people to regulate and govern their own social and economic affairs, until we wake up in the good year 1937 and find that while we profess to live under a government of, by, and for the people, which we are pleased to call a democracy, in truth and in fact we are living under a judicial oligarchy.

We have reached the point the mice reached when they woke up to the fact that for their own protection the cat should be belled.

But the mice were confronted by two problems. So are we. The problems were: Who to bell the cat? How to bell the cat?

The President has figured out a way to constitutionally—yes, I want to do it constitutionally—bell the cat. Under his plan it is up to the Congress to do the belling. The task should not be shunned by the Congress. As I see the matter the Congress should take peculiar delight in wresting from the judiciary the legislative powers it has unlawfully assumed—powers which, under the Constitution, were vested in the Congress and the Congress alone. If we fail we are inviting the people to lose faith in the ability of their legislative representatives to preserve the powers vested in the legislative branch of the Government by the Constitution. If we fail, we are admitting that we are unable to preserve the rights specifically delegated to us under the Constitution. I am unwilling to make such an admission.

I have called your attention to these three facts, namely: (1) That the constitutionality of acts of Congress often hinge upon the social and economic views of the Court and that judges rarely ever change their social and economic views; (2) that the Constitution is flexible enough to permit this to be done; and (3) that there is in truth and fact no effective check on the Supreme Court, in order to impress upon you the necessity, until we can properly check their powers by a constitutional amendment, of putting younger men on the bench whose social and economic philosophies are more in harmony with the heartbeats of the American people.

ROOSEVELT'S REORGANIZATION PLAN

Now let us examine and analyze the plan of reorganizing the Federal judiciary submitted by the President to the Congress.

(A) Constitutional

To begin with it is constitutional. In belling the cat he is staying within the Constitution. Not even the Liberty League, the Manufacturers Association, our Virginia Jeffersonian Democrats, or the most ribald opponent, will charge that the President is not performing a constitutional operation. That is more than can be said, in my opinion, of the operations of the Supreme Court on labor and the farmers and small-business men. And that is more than can be said, in my opinion, of some of the delicate operations the Supreme Court has performed in construing the "due process" clause, originally intended to protect human rights, to be the bulwark behind which special and corporate interests hide to strengthen and extend property rights, ofttimes even at the expense of human rights.

There seems to be no criticism of the proposals contained in the President's reorganization plan that Supreme Court judges should be pensioned upon resignation or retirement, that the Supreme Court needs a proctor, and that the Federal Government should have the right to intervene in all cases involving constitutional questions.

The proposal in the President's recommendations that has brought down upon his head the wrath of a certain class in this country, largely the privileged class, is that the Congress provide for the appointment of an additional Justice for each Justice who has reached the age of 70 and refuses to resign, provided, however, the size of the Supreme Court does not at any one time exceed 15.

(B) Respectable authority for the plan

Now, there is respectable authority for this procedure.

Let the record speak:

In 1869 the House of Representatives passed a bill, almost identical in terms with the President's proposal. The only thing that kept the bill from becoming the law of the land was the fact that it failed of passage in the Senate.

Justice McReynolds, whose economic and social views are so reactionary that he has not upheld the constitutionality of a single piece of New Deal legislation, was once Attorney General of the United States. At the age of 51, and while still Attorney General, he had this to say:

> I suggest an act providing when any judge of a Federal court below the Supreme Court fails to avail himself of the privilege of retiring now granted by law that the President be required, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint another judge, who shall preside over the affairs of the court and have precedence over the older one. This will insure at all times the presence of a judge sufficiently active to discharge promptly and adequately the duties of the court.

If such a recommendation was good for all Federal judges below the Supreme Court, why, may I ask, is it not good for Supreme Court judges? Surely, holding the high position they do, they should be as mentally and physically alert as district and circuit judges.

Justice McReynolds is now 75 years of age. He is still on the bench. So far he has failed to take the medicine he prescribed in his younger days for the old and infirm. Far be it from me to criticize him. Such, you know, is the way of the flesh.

President Taft, who afterward became Chief Justice Taft of the United States Supreme Court, once published a book under the title Popular Government, in which he approved in part, at least, Mr. Roosevelt's plan.

Said the Chief Justice:

> There is no doubt that there are judges at 70 who have ripe judgments, active minds, and much physical vigor, and that they are able to perform their judicial duties in a very satisfactory way. Yet in a majority of cases when men come to 70 they have lost vigor, their minds are not as active, their senses not as acute, and their willingness to undertake great labor is not so great as in younger men. * * *
> In the public interest, therefore, it is better that we lose the services of the exceptions who are good judges after they are 70 and avoid the presence on the bench of men who are not able to keep up with the work or to perform it satisfactorily.

(C) Not using high-handed methods

The President is not using high-handed methods, as many great Presidents in the past have done. The President's proposal, in the light of what some of the Presidents have done, is mild and timid.

Let the record speak:

Thomas Jefferson, you know, made the Louisiana Purchase without constitutional authority. Moreover, as soon as Jefferson was sworn in as President he went after the Federal judiciary. An act of Congress was immediately passed unbenching Adams' "midnight judges." Fearing that the Supreme Court would declare the act unconstitutional, he went further and got the Congress to pass an act suspending Supreme Court sessions for 14 months. President Lincoln got around the Supreme Court decision in the Dred Scott case by simply ignoring it. He just went ahead in spite of this decision and issued the Emancipation Proclamation. Those who followed had to amend the Constitution to make the proclamation constitutional. On another occasion Chief Justice Taney called upon President Lincoln to release a prisoner at Fort McHenry. Lincoln answered with a proclamation, in which he said, among other things:

> The judicial machinery seems as if it had been designed not to sustain the Government but to embarrass and betray it.

The prisoner remained in the fort. Andrew Jackson, when Chief Justice Marshall handed down the opinion in Worchester against State of Georgia reversing a decision of the Georgia Supreme Court, said:

> John Marshall has handed down his decision; now let him enforce it.

The decision was never enforced.

(D) What the President is trying to do

Now, what the President is attempting to do, sifted of the chaff, is simply this:

The President is only trying to relieve, in a constitutional way, an intolerable situation. He is not trying to change the Constitution, or curb in any way the power of the Court, or strip the Court of appellate jurisdiction. He is trying to keep special interests from using the Court to transform an inglorious defeat at the polls into a glorious victory by judicial fiat. He is trying to keep four or five judges, hang-overs from a social and economic era that commenced some years ago and ended with Hoover, from lawing on the people social and economic views which were repudiated by overwhelming majorities in the elections of 1932, 1934, and by every State in the Union in 1936 but two. The people have spoken, and he is anxious to have their thrice-expressed verdict translated into laws that will bring about the social and economic reforms they demand. He is trying to make way for an opportunity to place upon the bench men more in sympathy with the march of time, with our social and economic growth, with the heartbeats of America.

Other great Presidents have done the same thing, and they did not lessen their greatness in doing it.

Let the record speak:

Theodore Roosevelt was frank and open about the matter, and when Holmes was under consideration for the Supreme Court wrote Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, under date of July 10, 1902, as follows:

> Now I should like to know that Judge Holmes was in entire sympathy with our views, that is, with your views and mine and Judge Gray's views—for instance, just as we know that ex-Attorney General Knowlton is—before I would feel justified in appointing him.

Upon being assured by Senator Lodge that Holmes was in sympathy with their views on the Constitution, Roosevelt elevated Holmes to the Supreme Court.

Lincoln, in order to strengthen the chances that the acts passed during his administration would be held constitutional, increased the Court from 9 to 10. In appointing Chief Justice Chase, Lincoln said:

> We wish a Chief Justice who will sustain what has been done in regard to emancipation and the legal tenders.

But when Andrew Johnson came in, Congress, fearing he would get a chance to fill a vacancy on the Court, reduced the size of the Court from 10 to 7 by providing that no vacancy should be filled until the Court reached seven. The Legal Tender Acts were burning questions during Grant's administration. In filling two vacancies on the Court he appointed judges known to be in favor of the constitutionality of the acts. What happened? The very day he appointed these judges the Supreme Court held the Legal Tender Acts unconstitutional in a 5-to-3 decision. The cases were reargued, and a few months later the Court, by the vote of the two Grant appointees, held the acts constitutional. And it is common history that President Adams packed the courts with Federalists in order to curb the liberal Jefferson. In 1800, Thomas Jefferson, who had been in disagreement with the Court for years, and who had been the Court's most severe critic, won a sweeping victory over Adams, the Federalist candidate. The Supreme Court issue played an important part in the election. Between the election in November and the inauguration in March, President Adams, the defeated candidate, pushed through his "lame duck" Congress an act creating 16 new circuit courts and filled the new judgeships with "lame duck" Federalists.

Moreover, before the inauguration he secured the resignation of Chief Justice Ellsworth and appointed in his place John Marshall, arch foe of Thomas Jefferson. Thus, although the Federalists were defeated at the polls, they were able, through the judiciary, to defeat the liberal doctrines of Jefferson for many years to come. The same thing is going on today. The Bourbons and Tories have been thrice defeated at the polls. Today through a packed Court—and I use the word "packed" in no disparaging sense, but simply to convey the idea that a majority of the judges entertain the social and economic views held by the President appointing them—which they are turning heaven and earth to keep packed, they hope to defeat the social and economic views of President Roosevelt for many years to come.

If we believe in permitting the personal economic predelections of the Supreme Court judges to thwart the will of the people we should turn the President's proposal down. If, on the other hand, we believe the will of the people, as expressed by their ballots, is supreme and should, as far as possible, be translated into law, then we should stand by the President.

There is nothing in the Constitution, if construed by liberal men in sympathy with our present social and economic needs, that would prohibit the people from the enjoyment of practically all of the social and economic legislation passed by the Congress during the Roosevelt administration.

ANSWERS TO SOME OF THE OBJECTIONS RAISED

Now, let me answer some of the objections that have been raised to the proposal of the President.

(A) Amendment

Oh, they say Mr. Roosevelt should advocate an amendment to bring about his social and economic reforms. Well, while I think a liberal and present-day construction of the Constitution will accomplish the purpose, I would not be averse to an amendment spelling out the needed constitutional rights but for the fact that an amendment is a slow and cumbersome process. And let me state that many of those now talking about proceeding by amendment, now advocating an amendment, were, prior to Mr. Roosevelt's proposal, just as bitter in their denunciation of those advocating an amendment as they are against the reorganization plan. They do not want an amendment. What they are trying to do is to kill the reorganization plan by advocating some other process that it takes time to accomplish. They are simply using the amendment process as a stalemate to the reorganization plan.

But let us examine the amendment way of solving our troubles. As a practical proposition, in all likelihood, it will not work. We need present relief, and every fair-minded man knows that there is no hope for present relief if we resort to an amendment.

In order to amend the Constitution the amendment has to be submitted by the Congress to the States and ratified by three-fourths of the States. On a controversial amendment, such as would have to be submitted, the Bourbons and Tories could baffle the matter along for years. Thirteen States, comprising less than 3 percent of our population, could defeat ratification.

Let the record speak as to what happens to controversial amendments, especially when they are opposed by the privileged class:

On April 8, 1895, the Supreme Court, by a divided decision, declared the income-tax law of August 27, 1894, unconstitutional. An amendment was submitted by the Congress to the States. The privileged class, although we now recognize the income tax as the fairest of all tax laws, bitterly opposed the amendment as being a socialistic assault upon capital. Eighteen years later, after a bitter fight, the income-tax amendment was finally ratified by the States.

The Supreme Court, by a divided decision, held the child-labor law unconstitutional. The Congress on February 13, 1924, submitted to the States an amendment designed to give the Congress specific power to regulate and prohibit the working of children. This humane amendment has been bitterly opposed by the privileged class, many of whom have been able to swell their coffers by working unfortunate girls and boys for long hours at a pauper wage, and today, 13 years later, we find that the amendment has only been ratified by 26 States.

Any amendment submitted now would travel the same road.

Oh, but I hear someone say that the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments, known as the war amendments, were controversial amendments but were ratified by the States in 1 and 2 years after being submitted. Yes; that is true. But, remember, in many of the States it was a shotgun ratification.

(B) Dictator

I frequently hear the charge of dictator; that Mr. Roosevelt is attempting to become a dictator. Such a slimy charge but shows the length that the Bourbon and Tories will go in their effort to defeat all social and economic legislation designed to curb the avaricious and improve the condition of the masses in America.

Some of the opponents, unable to present valid and substantial reasons why the President's plan should not be put through, in their desperation resort to the old trick of frightening the people. If you are unable to resort to logic, then resort to fear. Well, with a record behind him such as the President has, it is going to be mighty hard to frighten the people into the belief that he wants to be a dictator.

But I will tell you what the people are afraid of: They are afraid the Supreme Court, if something is not done at once, will destroy all that has been and will be accomplished under the leadership of Mr. Roosevelt for the masses here in America; and they know if this should happen that the Tories and Bourbons will again assume the dictatorial powers they enjoyed before Mr. Roosevelt's advent into the national political arena.

Dictators, you know, are not born when the people have confidence in their governmental leaders. When leadership is actually functioning and attempting to bring relief to a people there is no danger of a dictator. Dictators spring into being when self-government breaks down, when the people are pressed to the wall, lose faith and confidence in their government, and become desperate, such as were the conditions back in the days of Hoover. If Mr. Roosevelt ever entertained—and, of course, he did not—playing the role of a dictator, he missed a golden opportunity in not grasping the scepter back in the early days of his administration. After the Hooverization the people would have turned to a dictator or anyone else who they thought could bring relief. Why, the Bourbons and Tories that are after him today were so badly frightened back in those days that they were petitioning the Congress to give the President dictatorial power.

But if the plan goes through, how, may I ask, will the change convert the President, who is one of our most democratic Presidents, and a great lover of the ordinary people, and a great believer in the doctrine that human rights are higher and more sacred than property rights, into a despot with a mailed fist? The very thought that such a change could or would take place is imbecilic. He is not asking that the Constitution be changed or that any of the checks provided for under the Constitution be removed. All that he is asking is that younger men, more familiar with the trend of the times, more in sympathy with the economic and social views that have been stamped by the approval of the ballots of a great majority of our people, be placed upon the Court.

Dictatorship! Those who are so violently opposed to the President's plan in order that they may retain the status quo had better beware lest in their zeal to thwart the will of the people they bring about a condition in this country that breeds dictators.

Dictatorship! Why, what does the opposition offer in lieu of the fanciful dictatorship they profess seeing in the borning?—The status quo, what we have today, judicial oligarchy which is certainly as dangerous, if not more so, than a real dictatorship.

(C) State rights

Then we hear the cry that if the President's plan is approved it will enable him to put through legislation that will destroy the doctrine of State rights.

And, as strange as it may seem, we hear the State-rights doctrine preached by the Republican Party when, as a matter of fact, everyone knows that the Republican Party during its long history has never been a believer in the doctrine. Their right-about-face has been caused by their desire to defeat the President's program.

Now, as a matter of fact, we have largely outgrown the doctrine of State rights. The sooner we realize this the better off we are going to be. The doctrine was first invoked to protect the people, and in a sparsely settled country such as was ours when the Constitution was adopted and for many years following, there was justification for the doctrine. It worked. Today, due to our complex civilization, brought about chiefly through the increase in our population and invention, the doctrine of State rights, in many cases, instead of accomplishing its original purpose, is a hindrance to our further social and economic development.

While I believe as firmly as ever in preserving the doctrine as far as possible, I realize that in many instances it has outlived its day and will no longer serve a useful purpose. Whenever the preservation of the doctrine of State rights, as sacred as it is to many of us, depends upon sacrificing the general welfare of any particular class, such as the farmers, those who labor, and those who are engaged in the coal industry, we should be willing to surrender the doctrine in the public interest and for the general welfare of those involved.

Take agriculture. Years ago when our country was sparsely settled, when we consumed what we produced and were not vexed with surpluses, there might have been some justification for saying that the farm problem was a local problem to be dealt with by the respective States. But in this age when the Supreme Court tells us, as it did in the A. A. A. decision, that the farm problem is a local problem to be dealt with by the 48 separate States, we begin to wonder if the Supreme Court really understands the farm problem. The farm problem is a national problem and can only be effectively dealt with by national legislation; and you cannot change the nature of the problem by judicial fiat.

What I have said with respect to agriculture applies with equal force to labor and the coal industry, as the Supreme Court has held the coal industry is a local problem to be dealt with by the respective States, and, seemingly, that the labor question is out in "no man's" land, wherever that is, and that under the Constitution it cannot be effectively dealt with by either the States or the National Government.

(D) Packing the Court

The leading newspaper in my State, which has been in sympathy with most of the New Deal legislation, thinks that the—

> Enlargement of the Court is dangerous * * * unless the people of this country wish to alter their form of government.

The issue, according to this paper, is—

> Whether the system of checks and balances between the executive, the legislative, and the judiciary shall be retained, or whether it shall be abolished.

Now, there is nothing novel or new in either enlarging or in reducing the membership of the Court. The number of judges on the Supreme Court has been changed from time to time. The Court was established in 1789 with six members. Its members were reduced in 1801 to five. In 1807 the members were increased to seven. In 1837 to nine. In 1863 to 10. In 1866 the members were reduced to seven. In 1869 the members were increased to nine, where it has since remained.

If it took nine judges in 1869, when our population was about one-third of what it is today, to dispatch the business of the Court, surely 15 members would not be considered an unreasonable number today.

But, of course, the fear the paper had in mind was the fear we have heard expressed every time there has been a change in the number of judges on the Court. Rightfully or wrongfully, every time there has been a change, the cry has gone up that the Court was being packed, and in doing this we were destroying our system of checks and balances and therefore undermining our form of government. Now, a sufficient answer to this is the fact that in spite of the six changes that have been made in numbers, and in spite of the hysteria each change has caused and the ugly charges that have been hurled on each occasion, our democracy has marched on.

But what do you mean by packing? If the word is used in the sense that the Court will be packed by the President and the Senate like a crooked lawyer would pack a jury or a crooked gambler would pack a deck of cards, there would be well-grounded reasons for fear. But the tongue that would give voice to such a dastardly charge against the President or the Senate should be—and I hope will be—paralyzed while the thought is still in the borning and before it reaches the stage of vocal expression.

But if it is used in the sense that the President and the Senate, not unlike other great Presidents and Senates in the past, are only anxious to see that those who interpret our laws are in sympathy with the spirit and thought of the times, there can be no well-grounded reasons for fear.

And there are those who state that no President should have the power to appoint six additional Supreme Court judges; that this is too much power for any one man to have. As a general proposition, this is true. But remember we are confronted with an unusual situation that should be met in a practical way. And also remember that while it may be dangerous, as a general rule, for so much power at one time to be vested in the President and the Senate, that it is also a dangerous thing for five men, no matter how learned, no matter how circumspect, to hold in their hands the destinies of 125,000,000 people. And especially is this true when the five men happen to be the representatives of a past economic and social age and their personal predilections will retard our further social and economic development.

Also remember that Presidents in the past have appointed as many if not more Supreme Court judges. George Washington appointed 12 members to the Supreme Court, Jackson appointed 5, Lincoln appointed 5, Grant appointed 4, Harrison appointed 4, Taft appointed 5 and elevated still another to be Chief Justice, Harding appointed 4, and Hoover appointed 3. So far President Roosevelt has not appointed a single member. If his proposal goes through and he is called upon to appoint the maximum number possible, which is six, it would be one less than were appointed under Harding and Hoover. I certainly believe the American people, without entertaining the least fear, are willing to give Mr. Roosevelt the right to appoint as many judges as President Harding and President Hoover put together.

(E) What would Jefferson do?

The so-called Jeffersonian Democrats, many of whom know very little about the teachings of the man they profess to follow, are, in rhetorical phrases, asking, What would Jefferson do? Then they proceed to draw upon their vivid imaginations and answer their own question by definitely and positively placing Mr. Jefferson against the President's plan to reorganize the Federal judiciary. These fellows, you know, are the possessors of vivid and fantastical imaginations that closely border on political delirium tremens, otherwise they could never conjure up a kinship between their political philosophies and the philosophies of government preached by Thomas Jefferson. If Mr. Jefferson went to heaven—and I feel quite sure he did—every time he hears one of these Jeffersonian Democrats talk I know he has a hard time deporting himself in a manner befitting the company of his present associates. Oh, if they would only quit trying to act the part of the prophet by prophesying what he would do and, for a season at least, would act the part of the student and find out what he actually did their views would be entitled to more weight.

Everyone familiar with American history knows that the high-handed methods of the Federal judiciary played an important part in electing Jefferson, who was the severest critic of the Federal courts, President in 1800. And everyone familiar with our history knows there is no kinship between Jefferson and the reactionaries who are fighting under the false banner of the Jeffersonian Democrats. Why Chief Justice Marshall not only regarded Jefferson as a radical but as an "absolute terrorist." In a letter written by Marshall to Charles Pickney the very morning Jefferson was sworn in as President he said:

> The Democrats are divided into speculative theorist and absolute terrorist. With the latter I am disposed to class Mr. Jefferson.

Mr. Jefferson was so incensed over the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Marbury against Madison that he said:

> If this opinion be sound, then, indeed, is our Constitution a complete felo-de-se. For, intending to establish three departments, coordinate and independent, that they might check and balance one another, it has given, according to this opinion, to one of them alone, the right to prescribe rules for the government of the other, and to that one, too, which is unelected by an independent of the Nation. The Constitution, on this hypothesis, is a mere thing of wax in the hands of the judiciary which the Judges may twist and shape into any form they please.

Upon retiring from the Presidency, Jefferson wrote to Judge Tyler, in part, as follows:

> We have long enough suffered under the base prostitution of law by party passions in one Judge and the imbecility of another. In their hands the law is nothing more than an ambiguous text, to be explained by their personal malice.

In other letters written by Jefferson he expressed these views:

> You will have a difficult task in curbing the judiciary in their enterprise on the Constitution. The judiciary, if rendered independent and kept strictly to their own departments, merits great confidence for their learning and integrity. But it now appears we have no law but the will of the Judge.
>
> The great object of my fear is the Federal judiciary. That body, like gravity, everlasting, with noiseless foot and unalarming advance, gaining ground step by step, and holding what it gains, is engulfing insidiously the special government into the jaws of that which feeds them.
>
> * * * * * * *
>
> We have seen, too, that, contrary to all example, the Judges are in the habit of going out of the question before them, to throw an anchor ahead, and grapple further hold for future advances of power.
>
> This member (the Court) of the Government was at first considered a most harmless and helpless of all its organs. But it has proved that the power of declaring what the law is, ad libitum, by sapping and mining, slyly and without alarm, the foundations of the Constitution, can do what open force would not dare to attempt. All know the influence of interest on the mind of man and how unconsciously his judgment is warped by that influence.
>
> * * * * * * *
> Knowing that religion does not furnish grosser bigots than law, I expect little from old Judges.
>
> It is a very dangerous doctrine to consider the Judges as the ultimate arbiters of all constitutional questions. It is one which would place us under the despotism of an oligarchy. The Constitution has erected no such tribunal, knowing that to whatever hands confided, with the corruptions of the time and party, its members would become despots. It has more wisely made all the departments coequal and cosovereign within themselves.

If Jefferson is the witness upon whom the opponents to the President's plan rely, they have, in the language of a famous Commonwealth's attorney in my section, who, when a witness called by him proved to be adverse, dismissed him with the laconic statement, "The sheriff evidently got him out of the wrong room."

(F) Immoral

There are those who even go so far as to charge the President with immorality in advocating a reformation of the Federal judiciary. Is it immoral to do a thing in a constitutional way? Remember all the President's recommendations are within constitutional limitations. Since when, may I ask, has it become immoral to resort to constitutional processes in reforming the judiciary? Let us be frank and honest about the matter; if any act of immorality has been committed, it has not been by the President but by the Court itself in disregarding the wishes of the people on social and economic problems as thrice expressed by their ballots, as enacted into law by their chosen representatives, and substituting therefor, in the language of Justice Stone, their "own personal economic predilections."

WHOSE CONSTITUTION IS IT, ANYWAY?

May I ask, Whose Constitution is it, anyway? Let us examine the instrument itself and see if any light is thrown on the subject. We will not have to read very far. The first three words reveal its ownership. "We the people"; yes, that is the way it begins, declaring in the very beginning its paternity. Yes; it sprang from the people, the greatest of their political offsprings, and may it please God to see that it is ever construed so as to promote the general welfare of those who gave it birth.

Oh, but let us read a little further, the whole preamble, and find out what "we the people" had in mind when it was established. It will tell the whole story. Listen:

> We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution of the United States.

May I ask again, Whose Constitution is it, anyway? Yes; it is the Constitution of the people. Under it, if rightly construed, its protecting cloak falls over the mansions of the rich, the hovels of the poor, the cells of the unfortunate. Under it, if rightly construed, the rich are protected in the enjoyment of their possessions, the farmers in the enjoyment of their acres, and labor in the enjoyment of honest toil. Under it, if rightly construed, the rich with their millions are unable to purchase a single ounce of justice or a single additional liberty that the poor cannot receive free of charge.

But, I am constrained to ask, Is the Constitution as at present construed accomplishing the high purposes set forth in the preamble? Is it? I am not asking you to take my word. But I beseech you to go ask the farmer, the small businessman, those who labor. Yes; go and ask the great masses here in this country. And with a voice containing but a few discordant notes they will answer, "We cried, and our supplications were heard by our President, acted upon by our duly chosen representatives, but our judiciary solemnly proclaimed that remedial legislation passed by the Congress at the instance of the President designed to insure our 'domestic tranquility' and promote our 'general welfare', to hold safe the social and economic progress we have made, was not vouchsafed to us under the great charter law of the land we love."

These are facts, and you cannot wipe them out by holloing dictator, by imputing sinister motives to the President, and wrapping the Supreme Court in the mantle of holiness.

These are facts that cry for redress, that demand action, and the only way you can wipe them out is by recognizing that the Constitution is not a dry, dead parchment but a living instrument whose flexible provisions should be adopted, to use the language of Chief Justice Marshall, "To the various crises of human affairs."

Democracy is a living organism, and its perpetuity depends upon its growth and development over the years. I would shudder for the fate of our descendants if I thought that our Government would ever become static. If it does, the end of the Republic is in sight.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE] such time as he may desire.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD on public ownership of power.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PUBLIC OWNERSHIP AT THE CROSSROADS

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, full well do I realize that I am not an expert on the theory and practice of public ownership. My contribution to the discussion, in order to be of any value, must be the story of some of my own experiences through which I have become convinced that the only solution of the problems of the utilities and great natural monopolies lies in public ownership. These experiences and observations cover activities of over a half century in the far West and the Pacific Northwest. I ask your pardon for the oft-repeated pronoun "I" which must be used as I relate the story of my education in this matter through years in public life as State senator, Governor of Oregon, and now in my third term in Congress. Some knowledge of the background of my experience in private life will also shed light on other reasons for convictions, and the influences which have brought me to the conclusion that we must seek to bring about public ownership, if we are to be successful in our great governmental experiment. In my business life I have been influenced by my training and experience as a lawyer, practicing over a period of 10 years; by the struggles incidental to farming on a large scale, producing cattle and wheat, which made me a shipper and user of transportation; and by a brief but vivid experience as builder and operator of an electric power plant. All along the line of travel I have encountered obstacles to be overcome because governmental units had not asserted the right, the fundamental right, to own and control natural monopolies. Here in Washington, for the past 4 years, I have encountered the same obstacles. I find the same players at the same old game, on a slightly enlarged scale. In all the battles the face of the enemy is the same.

I live in a section of the United States where this subject is now constantly discussed because of the building of the great dam on the Columbia River at Bonneville, and an even greater construction at Grand Coulee. Our public activities are now centered on legislation which shall hold the power generated at Bonneville so that it will be operated and controlled wholly by the Federal Government. We desire the widest possible use and the utmost benefit for our people from this project, and we are determined that it shall not become just another asset of the private utilities. We of the Pacific Northwest have had examples of successful public ownership in the operation of several municipal power plants in the States of Washington and Oregon, notably in Tacoma and Eugene.

REASONS FOR MY BELIEF IN PUBLIC OWNERSHIP

Powerful monopolies a corrupting influence

In my opinion, the removal of the influence which private monopolies now exercise over legislative bodies will be as beneficial to public life as was the removal from those legislative bodies of the election of United States Senators. The State of Oregon initiated this important phase of the popular government movement which has long been established among us through the important seventeenth amendment. Sometimes popular government does fail to function, but we have the machinery and we can use it with swift certainty when we learn that we have been fooled by some group by means of publicity and propaganda or by secret manipulations much more difficult to meet. Oregon was the first State to adopt popular election of Senators, and I was part of that fight, so I know why it was needed and about how hard it will be to remove one other great evil influence which sometimes determines the actions of legislative bodies. I was in public life in Oregon when it was common practice to attempt to buy members of the legislature just as bags of peanuts are bought. These purchases were generally made in anticipation of senatorial contests. Senators were practically auctioned off. On March 4 of this year, this very day, it is 40 years since Oregon lost one of its United States Senators for a considerable period because of just such a struggle, and the State had but one Senator. In the previous election, one of the railroads was reported to have spent fully $300,000 in the effort to control election of a United States Senator, and they lost by two votes, for which it was said they would have paid $50,000 each. The next opportunity to secure a Senator is supposed to have caused another railroad to put $225,000 into election expenses for candidates for the legislature. There were enough pledges to bring about the desired election, but it was lost through one of the most brilliant and unique devices ever used in the long struggle for political control. The opposition prevented the house from organizing, through lack of a quorum, during the 40 days allowed for the session under the constitution. This was the first "sit-down" legislature on record. Out of all this corruption came the movement for direct election of United States Senators. Now that battle has been won, and there is a similar influence working in a quiet and more finished manner, but equally determined to control legislation in the interests of a particular group.

I repeat my conviction that we must demand public ownership, first, because of the necessity for removing the influence which monopolies and great aggregations of capital exert on public life and legislative bodies, otherwise we cannot begin to approach the ideal government and we cannot maintain our democracy. If anyone doubts the potency of this influence let him study the history of the struggle for holding company legislation in the Seventy-fourth Congress. Millions were spent in propaganda. The spread of stock, so shrewdly calculated over long years, had given these companies thousands of willing organizers who were diverted from the real wrongs and evils of the holding companies and made propagandists against public regulation. They feared the change which would have been so beneficial to all investors. We must remove this power gained through great corporate wealth and influence. We must recognize this as a fight for political decency as well as for economic justice.

Regulation impossible

My second reason for the conviction that public ownership is inevitable is the belief that regulation is utterly impossible. I had considerable experience with this when I was Governor of Oregon. I repeatedly asked the legislature to give me the power to appoint members of the public service commission which controlled the rates of utilities. That power was denied me because the utilities feared honest regulation and control. My successors were granted that privilege, and it has been seesawed through administrations, depending entirely upon safety to the utilities and their assurance that it would be perfectly satisfactory. The regulators have ceased to command the respect and confidence of the people. Private monopoly controls not only legislatures, and sometimes governors and public service commissions, but it often controls party organizations. We must change that system or submit to the tragedy and humiliation of losing the greatest governmental opportunity of history. We have failed to control monopoly, therefore, we must abolish it.

Proper taxation impossible

When I was Governor I was also member, ex-officio, of the State tax commission. I determined that a certain powerful utility, paying ridiculously low taxes, in no way commensurate with those borne by others, should be taxed on a valuation more nearly approximating that on which its rates were based. I shall never forget that tax fight. We accomplished something, but incidental to it was a proposed recall campaign directed against myself as Governor. It was one of the factors which accounted for my defeat in the campaign for reelection. Here again the spread of stock was a potent factor. I well recall an amusing incident in this connection. A bootblack said to his customer that he would not vote for that man Pierce for Governor because he would ruin "our company." Inquiry brought out the fact that the bootblack owned one share in that famous company, soon to be infamous when it became the property of a holding company which brought financial ruin and tragedy to investors. I cannot forget the newspaper advertisements with their promises of 7 percent and the enticing news that everyone could now participate in the large earnings. Many a banker saw to it that all the funds of widows and orphans and trusts under their control were invested in those stocks. Yes, the little fellows were let in, and then let down, but when they became stockholders they became citizens who objected to any proper taxation of utilities as well as to any proper regulation. It is practically impossible to get just taxes from the privately owned monopolies.

Economic loss

The only other reason for public ownership, which I shall take time to mention, is the loss incidental to the private control and ownership of utilities. Gradually we are learning that economic necessity will force Government ownership of natural monopolies, such as transportation and communication, and of natural resources. What a blessing it would be now to have the telephone and the telegraph operated as part of the Post Office Department. How remiss we have been in public duty in allowing private control of the radio. We had the fine example of England, we knew better, but we allowed this most important avenue of communication, this important agency for controlling public opinion, to become a private agency. Certainly we must have public ownership in this field.

The great natural resources of our country—how they have been wasted and exploited because we had not the vision, wisdom, and courage to assert ownership in the forests, the coal, and the oil fields; yes, and to insist upon conservation of the soil. The Nation is now beginning to realize the waste of exploitation of such resources.

One more illustration comes to my mind and I mention it at a venture because it is outside my actual experience. I throw it out for discussion by those better trained in economics. That is, the suggestion that if we had in the beginning controlled our oil resources, we should not have suffered so severely from the economic break-down, which, I assume, was partly caused by draining money from the whole country into one financial center. Now that the internal-combustion engine has revolutionized our lives, we fully realize that the Government itself should control oil and gas, and that control alone would be so potent financially that it would be comparable to the control of the gold reserves of the Nation. Oh, that the past generation had listened to those who begged for public ownership before its natural resources had made so many men rich and powerful.

OBJECTIONS AND FEARS INCIDENTAL TO PUBLIC OWNERSHIP

Public business versus private business

I should make it clear that I do not believe public ownership is a panacea for all our governmental ills. I do not think it will bring the millenium nor any approach to that happy state. I do believe it will remove from our political life the greatest source of public corruption, because of the concentration of power and money incidental to the operation of utilities. Usually the first argument against Government ownership is emphasized by pointing to Government corruption and incompetence, every exhibition of which is an argument against public ownership.

I am one who believes that public business is actually more honestly conducted than private business and more responsive to public opinion and control. I do not admit that public business is less efficiently operated than private big business. I am not one who stands in awe of the efficiency of big business. I think it largely an idle boast, contraverted by the publication of revelations made during rate-making inquiries and congressional hearings and investigations. Certainly the results of such investigations have pointed to excessive waste and shocking dishonesty. Many millions of so-called investors could testify on this matter. I admit, however, their tendency to believe the statements of those who have confiscated their earnings and to trust them rather than to trust the Government. The reason for this inefficiency in big business seems to be greed, delegated responsibility, and the aforesaid shrewdly calculated spread of stock so that really conscientious small owners have no influence. If there were time, I should like to compare almost any great private business with the efficiency of our Postal Service. I believe that is a complete and perfect answer to those who claim that the public cannot successfully transact business in a large way.

Bureaucracy and the civil service

The civil service is right in theory, but it must be very much improved and very much modified before it can become a perfect instrument for furnishing the personnel for the public service. Bureaucracy I do fear. I detest it, as I encounter it day by day in this National Capital. We can control it to a certain extent, though I believe we must avoid it by decentralizing in every possible manner. The only thing we can do is to insist upon improvement. We must have a different type of civil-service examination in order to test those who are applicants for administrative positions. This is vitally important, because the business conducted for the public, under a system of public ownership, must be administered honestly and intelligently and with a loyalty to the service. Governments are corrupt when powerful interests corrupt them for gain. Many of the evils incidental to bureaucracy will be eliminated when pressure of certain big-business groups is removed through Government ownership of utilities.

Government control not always successful

In the far West we are dependent upon great irrigation projects, which are under Government control. It has, for many years, been the stated policy of the Reclamation Service to give to the farmers on the irrigation projects the benefits of power generated in connection with the water supply. Over all these years there has been failure to put this policy into general operation. I know of one case in which farmers on a project were forced to sell the power for something like $3,000, and it was immediately capitalized for $400,000 by the private utility to which it was sold by the Government. In my own district certain farmers were forced by Government officials to sell their power rights for $100,000, and these were immediately capitalized by the favored company for $4,000,000, and all that section has been paying power rates based on this steal. Yes, Government officials sometimes betray their trust. I fear big interests have their tools in many Government buildings here in Washington. Unscrupulous people can pass civil-service examinations and sit in the places of authority. They may also be appointed to such positions through political patronage. I know all that; but I still believe that we will be vastly better served throughout this Nation if the utilities are under Government control and operation. We shall not gain anything if we sacrifice our objective because we have sometimes been betrayed. Let us strive for decency in public life, because we must entrust so much to government.

The cost of acquisition

This is a stumbling block always when we talk of public ownership. How shall we acquire these great properties without bankrupting the Government? Probably the Government must pay much more than they are worth. No one desires to do injustice, nor to confiscate private property. We must undertake the struggle with these great powerful ones who are not going to yield unless they are forced to do so. They often control those groups which might force them to deal honestly. I know how reluctant private owners would be to part with their holdings. They honestly believe they are entitled to run the business, and they are sincerely opposed to public ownership. It is always difficult to make the changes demanded by any new economic conditions. I can shed some light on this phase of it from my own experiences in building, operating, and selling a power company.

Some years ago I found myself builder, director, manager, president, and large part owner of an electrical power company. It was about the time when big companies were forming, and I attended many of their meetings and got an insight into some of the tricks of the trade. Among these was the famous injunction, repeated and adapted to the power world, "remember Harriman's advice—every time you lay a new rail or a new tie, issue a bond." Adapted to the electrical world, it was "every time you put up a pole or string a mile of wire, issue a bond. If you cannot sell the bonds, lock them up in your safe; the day may come when our right to charge certain rates will be questioned. The courts will never deny us a rate sufficient to pay dividends on our bond issues."

The property in my hands was comparatively small, giving electrical service to about 20,000 people. When I found I could not play the game, I sold my property and in the transaction secured an education in valuations. At that time the selling price of an electrical property with valuable rights and franchises was supposed to be five times the gross income, with little attention paid to physical valuation. When transfers of property were made, an amazing number of things might be charged in the valuation—useless dams, and much other deadwood. Can we ever secure an honest and unquestioned valuation of transmission lines and power properties for purposes of Government purchase? The power line I built cost $1,000 a mile. Near it is a line constructed some years later at a cost, as I understand it, on the books of the company of $15,000 a mile. Can it be possible that it cost 15 times as much as the line I constructed? Can it be possible that these bits of burned clay, the three insulators on each pole cost $90 apiece, the value said to be charged on the books?

RAILROAD RATES AND PUBLIC OWNERSHIP

My experience as a shipper of wheat and cattle, under the handicap of location in the interior, has convinced me that only through Government ownership can we equalize the benefits of railway transportation, keep people in the interior country, and continue in the farming business. In wartimes the cost of freight on a bushel of wheat from my place to Portland was 9 cents; it is now 15½ cents a bushel for freight, and warehouse charges have doubled. Fifty miles nearer to Portland the freight is 4 cents less a bushel. Yes, years ago when the management of this western railway was in the West, where it properly belonged, we had that differential cut to 2 cents, where it remained for 15 years. When the management moved to Wall Street, the differential was doubled.

A committee of the House has reported out the so-called Pettengill bill to restore the obnoxious old system of allowing the railroads to charge more for a short haul than for a long haul in the same direction over the same track. This should convince those of us who have studied the problem that the sooner we take over the railroads the better it will be for the development of the country. The cost in subsidies of lands, loans, and privileges would have paid the bill at fair valuation. Since subsidies have now become the order of the day and appear as a legitimate demand, why, in the name of justice, do we not at once pay the whole bill and own what we have bought over and over again?

BONNEVILLE DAM AND ITS POWER PROBLEM

Franklin D. Roosevelt will be remembered in history as the President who laid the foundation for the greatest hydroelectric power development in all the world. Here I pause to pay tribute to Senator NORRIS, whose wisdom, foresight, courage, and tenacity have made possible the successful organization of the great T. V. A. development, which is the pattern and inspiration for the others.

The Columbia River is the second river in the United States in size. It has a constant flow of water, draining an immense territory, and fed from the snows and rains, with falls of many hundreds of feet through rocky caverns, making the building of dams comparatively cheap. These dams will afford, in the years to come, a staggering amount of electrical power and energy—41 percent of all hydroelectric power available in the United States. There will be enough to turn the wheels of industry and to light and heat homes and factories of a great industrial and agricultural population which will be increased by those coming to it from regions less favored by Nature. The energy which will be developed should be sold to the real consumer, to cooperative systems, and municipally owned plants at actual cost. Part of the Bonneville investment of forty millions, probably one-half, must be charged to navigation. The balance of the investment and the cost of Government-built transmission lines will make a total Government investment which should be liquidated by users of the electricity within a period of 50 years.

Think of the opportunity when that debt has been paid and the capital investment wiped out. The cost of operation will be small, the plant will still be in excellent condition, and the wheels will turn to produce electricity at a very low cost. What a heritage for the coming generations!

Congress will this session determine who is to enjoy the benefits of this great project. Shall the project enrich the private companies or shall it be used according to the T. V. A. plan and that of Ontario, for the benefit of the people? The utilities are working on this with extraordinary thoroughness. Their friends are in positions of authority in political, legislative, and administrative groups. They have a great advantage in the control of publicity. One of the most extensive purveyors of canned editorials against public ownership and public regulation operates in and from Oregon. The canned editorials supplied by this firm are inspired by utility pocketbooks and are frequently used, I regret to say, by our own weekly papers when the editors are too busy to prepare copy. Utility agents are present even when little groups of country people are meeting in their grange halls. The battle is being fought at every crossroads. In Oregon the State Grange has carried on the fight for public ownership and control. From its meager treasury the money has been spent for publicity and for initiating bills allowing the State and utility districts to prepare for the coming of Bonneville. Every proposed bill has been fought by the organized private utility interests.

Rural electrification through Bonneville power

Our farmers have been encouraged to believe that they are to farm in a new era as soon as Bonneville power is developed and marketed. They understand that the territory which is left to be supplied through rural cooperation in power districts is the poorest territory from a business standpoint, because the private utilities have already gone into the thickly settled communities. Unfortunately, many farmers in Oregon, unaware of pending changes and plans, were prevailed upon by private power companies to sign up for rural extensions. There is little doubt that these signatures were obtained in pressure campaigns under lack of information which amounted to misrepresentation. It remains to be seen just how this situation can be handled for the benefit of the farmers.

Under our State law, written into the statutes through the efforts of the State Grange, the work of forming power districts has been going forward slowly. This rather slow development can be traced directly to the private utilities which use every possible scheme for blocking the organization of districts, which must be voted upon in the territory of each proposed district. These powerful organizations, generously financed and skilled in publicizing their views, make it very difficult for groups of farmers, newly organized and inexperienced, to win an election for establishment of a power district. Through propaganda in meetings and printed matter, the voters are made to believe that they will be entering upon a hazardous experiment. The burden of proof rests upon the weaker group. The Rural Electrification Administration must have authority to come to the rescue of such groups and to assist definitely in the necessary promotional work. The farmer and the Government are partners in this undertaking, but the law as it now stands prevents the Government from entering into the activity essential to a successful enterprise until after the hardest battle has been fought. There is no agency put in the field by State or Nation to help these groups to plan and to set the facts before the people concerned. They are left to provide electrification for the most thinly settled territory in the most unproductive regions and to face the most difficult problems in power development. In this situation Federal and State Governments are unable to provide help in initiating enterprises, apparently because powerful interests have made the law partially inoperative. We should have a right to depend on the R. E. A. for power district development and for the encouragement of cooperative projects through promotional work. My colleague from Mississippi, who knows this subject better than any man in Congress knows it, says that the coming of electricity to rural regions doubles the land value of each farm it touches. His glowing accounts of the transformations wrought by rural electrical development certainly increase our determination to try to secure the same benefits for our people. Electric power will build up the country and will increase values. We are faced with the responsibility of working out the plan through which this may be accomplished. These great private utilities are getting Government money at 3 percent in order to take current to unserved rural regions, and they seem determined to reserve for themselves the benefits of 3-percent Government money. They have been in business so long that they know just where to move in order to build most advantageously.

Publicly owned power districts must either generate their own power or buy it from some conveniently located municipal plant or private utility. Although the Rural Electrification Administration is authorized to make loans for the construction of generating plants, few such loans have been made. However, it is understood that its policy is becoming steadily more liberal in this respect. The wholesale power rate contained in the contract between the power district and the municipal plant or private utility is subject to the approval of the Rural Electrification Administration by reason of the fact that the Administration is vitally concerned in assisting the district to obtain its power at a low rate. With a low wholesale rate the power district will be enabled to supply power to its consumers at a rate which will permit of the building up of a high load. A high load means more revenue for the power district, and thus there will be no question but what the project will be self-liquidating. Certainly it is reasonable that our Government, in making loans for rural electrification projects, must have the right to condition its loans upon the reasonableness of the wholesale rate which its borrowers must pay for electric energy. We have a long way to go in order to make most successful the administrative side of the Government's effort to take electricity to the farmers. Certainly the State has an obligation in this connection, but it is not spending money to promote these districts, and has not entered upon a great program, such as we have undertaken nationally. I doubt if the battle can be fought on State lines with any certainty of victory for the people. Let us strengthen our Federal undertaking and adopt the loan and grant plan for municipalities and power districts which are building rural systems.

We must also have legislation which will give our Government the absolute and unquestioned right to lend its funds to cooperative public power districts, which are not rural, and to use them for the development of publicly-owned power projects. Our own great Public Works Administration has been hampered in its program by injunctions and difficulties of all sorts raised against loans and grants for such development.

Bonneville legislation in Congress

Today the most important issue in Congress, from the standpoint of the Pacific Northwest, is the relation of the Government to the control of the power soon to be developed at Bonneville. In the immediate future, we shall have Grand Coulee, also, as that is built for a combination of irrigation and power. If the people retain their rights, we shall see a remarkable development of rural electrification and of industries operating under a new order. This should be done without the concentration and crowded population which has made industrial centers elsewhere such problems from the standpoint of health and social welfare.

The President sent to Congress, on February 24, a communication transmitting the progress report on the Bonneville electric power project. This communication contained recommendations for immediate action made by the Committee on National Power Policy, recently appointed by the President. The committee, as its first assignment, made a study of Bonneville because of the immediate need for legislative action in connection with that project. The committee states that, though the major projects in the Columbia River Basin should be considered together, it has been compelled to report on Bonneville project first and to set up a provisional administration, pending the establishment of a permanent regional plan. Based on the findings transmitted to Congress, bills will soon be introduced in the House and Senate incorporating the recommendations of the committee. I shall introduce such a bill in the House. It is my judgment that the Congress should follow the President's recommendation and set up this provisional administration in the manner suggested. The bill will provide for the appointment by the Secretary of the Interior of one administrator, with an advisory board of three designated by the Secretaries of the Interior and War and the Federal Power Commission. This administrator is charged with the duty of making all necessary arrangements for the disposition of the electrical energy not required for the operation of navigation facilities at the dam. He is authorized to provide electric transmission lines, the substations, and other facilities necessary to take electrical energy from Bonneville to existing and potential markets. He is also directed to enter into contracts for the sale of electrical energy, at wholesale rates, to public and cooperative agencies, in conformity with rate schedules to be approved by the Federal Power Commission. He is required to give preference and priority to public and cooperative agencies. This administrator is given great power, but he has definite responsibilities to governmental agencies.

Provision is made for paying off the cost of transmission lines in the same manner applied to the amortization of the costs of the power project. An initial step is the necessity of determining the allowance for the amount of the investment at Bonneville which should be charged to navigation and the amount charged to power. It is my belief that the Army engineers should continue to operate the machinery of the dam, but should be relieved of all responsibility in connection with the marketing of electrical power. We recognize that the Bonneville project is primarily for navigation, and certainly for that type of service the Army engineers afford the best trained managers.

The opposition to Government operation of this and all similar projects solely in the interests of the ultimate consumer is well organized and determined. That has been demonstrated during the years of T. V. A. battles in Congress and through the courts. We must beware of "Greeks bearing gifts." Many of the close friends of private power monopolies will pretend to be for public ownership when in fact they are allied with private monopolies and planning that they shall become the chief beneficiaries. We have also to meet the strongly voiced opposition of those who would reserve Bonneville power for "industry at tidewater." Those, like myself, who believe that all consumers, large or small, near or far, are entitled to the benefits of this great natural resource and that such benefits can be realized only through public ownership and operation must now call to fight by our side all the wise and resourceful leaders who have won the other great battles. We know that the problem of cheap power can be solved only by Government ownership and operation. Power must be delivered to the ultimate consumer at yardstick rates based on actual costs. The enterprise must be entirely free from pooling of public and private power-transmission facilities except at the outset and on short-term contracts. This latter point is being bitterly contested by the utility companies, and slips are widely scattered stating that it would mean an "economic waste." They forget the "economic waste" of investors' losses through manipulations of holding companies. It is now impossible and unwise to allocate any definite percentage of current as between public and private agencies. We can only say that public agencies must have preferential service at wholesale rates. Industries must be encouraged to establish plants throughout the territory reached by Government lines. The Pacific Northwest looks to Congress for the great privilege of developing its section of the country, with the cooperation and powerful backing of the Federal Government. Our first need is for a satisfactory law under which may be determined the methods of administration and operation under which the benefits of Bonneville Dam may be realized and enjoyed. Certainly we shall agree that our water powers must be used for the service of all instead of the profit of the few.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BIERMANN] if he now desires 15 minutes?

Mr. BIERMANN. I do not like to impose on the Members if they want to adjourn.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BIERMANN].

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, since the World War, with the exception of 1 or 2 years, the United States has spent more money each year on its Navy than any other nation on earth. During those 1 or 2 years England spent a little more than we. I assume that every Member of this House is reasonably patriotic. I assume that everyone wants to keep any invading force off our shores. I think all of us want "adequate" preparedness. The question is, What is "adequate" preparedness? At the present time I think this Congress is infected with some kind of mental affliction, with all due respect, that compels them to vote for any kind of appropriation that the Army or Navy asks for, and without asking the reason. It would be logical to ask in the case of voting a half-billion-dollar appropriation for preparedness, "Against whom are we preparing?" Nobody has attempted to answer that question here. Nobody has answered that question since I have been in this House. Are we preparing against England? Of course not. A revival of the War between the States is just as likely as a war between the United States and Great Britain. Are we preparing for a war with Germany? Where would we fight that war? They certainly could not come over here. Are we preparing for war with France? They could not come over here. Are we preparing for war with Japan? Certainly Japan, with half our population and probably 25 percent our financial strength, could not go 5,200 miles to San Francisco or 4,500 to Seattle to invade us. But for 35 years that I know of, jingo people like William Randolph Hearst—I think I would better not describe what I think of him or of his newspapers—have been poisoning the people of this country that we are in danger of war with Japan. Japan thinks she is in danger of war with us. I think Japan has just as good reason for her belief as we have for the belief that prevails here.

I noticed this little clipping in a Washington paper yesterday:

> Scientific methods of warfare are being strenuously studied in Japan, it was disclosed in the Diet. Fear of the United States was given as the reason for the new program.

It is appalling when we consider the amount of these appropriations. I want to compliment the committee for somewhat cutting down this appropriation below the Budget estimate. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, the Departments of Agriculture, of Commerce, of the Interior, which included the Boulder Canyon, of Justice, of Labor, of State, and of the Treasury, all seven combined, cost the people of the United States $426,000,000. That is for the year ending June 30, 1936. Tomorrow we will be asked to vote an appropriation for the Navy alone of $526,000,000 or $100,000,000 more than it cost to operate those seven departments in the fiscal year 1936.

Up to the year 1904 the entire running expenses of the Government of the United States in no peacetime year had equaled what we are asked now to vote for the Navy alone. And they do not tell us against whom we are preparing, and they do not tell us what nation may invade us.

I have put out the challenge here many times, and I put it out here again, that none of the proponents of this bill can get any statement from any Army officer, whether he be second lieutenant or full general, or a statement from any Navy officer, whether he be ensign or full admiral, saying that it is possible for any foreign power or any combination of foreign powers to invade this country. The officers will not so stultify themselves as to make such a statement. I leave this as a challenge, a standing challenge. When we consider the military appropriation bill I want this challenge to stand then. I especially invite the proponents of this bill to give us the name of any Army officer or any Navy officer who will say that this Nation could be invaded.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. I am sorry to decline to yield but time does not permit.

I want to quote from an article by Maj. Gen. Smedley D. Butler in the Liberty Magazine of November 21, 1936:

> Any nation choosing to war upon us would have to come a minimum of 3,000 miles by water. No military man, no matter how reckless, ever would contemplate invading a nation of 130,000,000 people with less than 1,000,000 soldiers. Mussolini did not begin his war on Ethiopia—a nation of only 10,000,000 people, a nation virtually defenseless—until he had 400,000 soldiers in Africa.
> And this minimum of 1,000,000 men, to be at all effective, would have to be transported in one great armada; would have to be landed safely on our shores, with a goodly percentage of their stores, within a period of about a week or 10 days and along a comparatively short stretch of about 100 miles.
> • • • • • • •
>
> A million men, prepared for 3 months of living and fighting overseas, would require 5,000,000 tons of food, ammunition, and supplies of all sorts.
>
> There is hardly enough shipping in the entire world, including the United States, to transport 1,000,000 men and the necessary stores across 3,000 miles of ocean in a period of 10 days.
>
> • • • • • • •
> As a matter of fact, all the maritime nations of the world together have only about 160 ships of 15,000 tons or more each, with a total tonnage of less than 3,500,000. If all these ships—and they include 20 of our own—could be mobilized, they would not be sufficient to carry the required men in one crossing from Europe or Asia to the United States.

We do not have to take the word of Gen. Smedley D. Butler about transporting troops. We have our own experience. We ourselves engaged in a war 20 years ago beginning the 6th of next month, and we had the Navies of Great Britain, the United States, France, and Italy to help transport our troops. We sailed across an ocean that did not have a single enemy craft above the surface of the water, and we had no opposition until we got close to the other shore. How many men did we transport from May 1917 until the armistice in November of 1918? We transported 2,100,833 troops across the ocean with the combined four navies I have just mentioned.

Gen. Smedley Butler contends that a nation to have any chance of successfully invading our shores would have to transport 1,000,000 men over here in about 10 days. The most we ever transported to Europe in a month was 312,000 men. That was in July 1918. Even though we had these big navies to protect and help us, and even though we were unobstructed in our passage, we would have to pick out the 4 biggest months in order to find a group of 4 months in which time we transported over the seas as many as 1,000,000 men.

This talk of the United States being invaded by any foreign power or combination of foreign powers is just sheer bunk; that is what it is; and I defy anybody supporting the contrary proposition to come in here and prove that that is not so. I defy them to get the statement of any Army or Navy officer saying that this Government can be invaded in any way on either shore.

This thing would amuse me if it were not so serious. The fact is there are men here who objected yesterday to granting an authorization for $5,500,000 to give the star-route carriers of the United States reasonable salaries; but these same men when a bill of this size comes along, without being able to offer a single argument for it, yet will vote for it on tomorrow afternoon.

When we passed the Vinson-Trammell bill, we authorized, among other things, the beginning of the construction of two battleships, to cost $51,000,000 apiece—and I might explain that the flotilla which has to accompany each one of these battleships, according to Major General Mitchell, I believe, costs another $50,000,000. So, a couple of years ago the estimate for one of these outfits was $100,000,000. We authorized the expenditure of $51,000,000 on each of these ships. Now, if you will turn to page 571 of the hearings on this bill, you will find these items: "Battleships, BB–55 and BB–56." These are the two ships in question. The total amount necessary to build these two ships and their armor, armament, and ammunition is $120,346,000—sixty-million-dollars-and-some-odd money for each one of these ships which were authorized a year ago at $51,000,000.

Sometimes it is of advantage to compare some of these expenditures with other expenditures that are of more value.

The new buildings in the triangle between Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues, beginning with the Department of Commerce Building and concluding with the Archives Building, cost the Government of the United States $65,000,000. Just think of it, $65,000,000 for all those magnificent new buildings. The Treasury Building cost $8,000,000. The Capitol of the United States cost about $15,000,000, according to David Lynn, the Architect. The Library cost $9,000,000. The State, War, and Navy Building cost $10,000,000. In other words, all these buildings I have mentioned—and they are the pride of our National Capital—cost $107,000,000. The cost of these two ships, if the cost does not increase in the next year, will be $120,000,000. All of this money is being given to the Navy Department without anyone attempting to come here and tell us against what nation we are preparing, or what nation or combination of foreign nations could possibly stand a Chinaman's chance of successfully invading this country.

Mr. Chairman, I earnestly hope the Members of the House who honestly want to economize, who want to cut the expenditures of our Government, and God knows we should cut them, will take the opportunity tomorrow to vote down this bill.

Mr. HILL of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HILL of Oklahoma. The gentleman stated the Members of the House would largely vote for this measure just because it has been recommended by the committee.

Mr. BIERMANN. Yes.

Mr. HILL of Oklahoma. It is a pleasure to me to announce to the gentleman that here is one Member who will not vote for it, even on this side of the House. If this bill were taken apart and disemboweled so that we could vote for certain sections of it, I might support some of the bill, but I cannot support all of the bill and cannot vote for it.

Mr. BIERMANN. I thank and commend the gentleman.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DITTER. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, there has been in the last few years a very considerable discussion of the reciprocal-trade agreements and the benefits resulting therefrom to different industries. May I call attention to the hearings held in reference to this bill, beginning at page 889? There appeared before the committee a distinguished Representative on the majority side of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLER]. He told the committee that last year we produced in America 28,428 tons of manganese as against 315,000 tons in 1918. The requirements of the United States for this strategic war material are 700,000 tons a year. Just so the industry might have a little harder sledding and so that our Government might be in a little worse shape if we were in trouble and needed manganese, and could not import it any longer, a reciprocal-trade agreement was made with Brazil a little over a year ago in which the tariff was reduced from 1 cent to one-half cent a pound. This results in a difference of only a few cents a ton in the cost of steel, but it makes an insuperable difference in the cost of manganese and the ability of the American producer to produce it.

Mr. Chairman, may I call the Committee's attention to a colloquy between the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLER] and the chairman of the committee:

Mr. UMSTEAD. You make the point there that if it continues as it is that the producers and manufacturers will necessarily have to go out of business?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir; they are going out of business.

Mr. UMSTEAD. And when and if the Government does need this material they will have to start from scratch again?

Mr. MILLER. They will have to start from scratch; and then we will be forced to subsidize them.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Without any going manufacturing concerns or mining concerns engaged in it, the cost to the Government at that time would be tremendous?

May I call attention to a further colloquy between the gentleman from Arkansas and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER]?—

Mr. DITTER. Mr. MILLER, since when has this disastrous condition, this trouble that you so graphically painted a moment ago, developed?

Mr. MILLER. Since when?

Mr. DITTER. Yes; since when has that condition developed?

Mr. MILLER. Since 1929; particularly since 1929.

Mr. DITTER. Has it been emphasized in any way since the adoption of reciprocal-trade agreements?

Mr. MILLER. Decidedly so.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Then, I take it, that insofar as this particular industry in your State is concerned, that you feel these reciprocal-trade agreements have been detrimental rather than helpful?

Mr. MILLER. That one has.

Mr. DITTER. Has it resulted in a decrease of employment in your district?

Mr. MILLER. Decidedly in that industry.

Mr. DITTER. In that industry?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. DITTER. Have you presented this claim of injustice, insofar as your people are concerned, to Professor Sayre?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. DITTER. Has he indicated any sympathetic attitude toward them?

Mr. MILLER. Oh, yes; but he had to take care of our cotton and other stuff, he said.

Mr. DITTER. So that, as far as any tangible results are concerned, neither Professor Sayre nor Secretary Hull has given you any relief?

Mr. MILLER. No, sir.

Mr. Chairman, that is the situation in which many of the industries of this country and those in the farming area of our country find themselves due to the operations of the Reciprocal Tariff Act. I hope that, with these items continually being brought to the attention of the Members of Congress, the time will soon arrive when they will wake up to what is being done to them through the operation of these reciprocal tariff acts and that they will stop this delegation of power which is ruining American agriculture and American industry.

I remember a few days ago having an interview with a gentleman in the office of the Secretary of State and telling him that ever since he began his operations not one industry and not one item of agriculture in my territory had been benefited but, on the contrary, had got the worst of it all the way down the line. The situation is, for the sake of promoting the prosperity of foreign people, our industries and our agriculture have been traded away. Is it not time for the American people to wake up to that situation and put a stop to this way of doing business? [Applause.]

Mr. BIERMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BIERMANN. The gentleman's theory of international trading is that we sell to foreign countries all we can, but take back only cash and nothing else?

Mr. TABER. Oh, no.

Mr. BIERMANN. That is the rock-bound Republican theory.

Mr. TABER. No; it is not. Our theory is we should not cut the heart out of American farming and American industry.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. HOOK. Does not the gentleman know that one of the largest industries in this country, the automobile industry, is located largely in the State of Michigan, and does not the gentleman also know that the automobile industry through its leaders went to the Republican National Convention and asked that convention to advocate reciprocal-trade agreements because they had been the salvation of the industry?

Mr. TABER. I know that did not happen, because I was on the resolutions committee at that convention and they did not appear before the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. HOOK. They certainly wrote letters to their leaders about it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I rise today to submit some general observations on the need of governmental economy that have occurred to me during my service on the Appropriations Committee, and specifically to call attention to a very praiseworthy move in that direction by the Joint Committee on Printing, of which the able gentleman from North Carolina, Hon. J. WALTER LAMBETH, is chairman.

Sometimes I wonder, from the experience of the last 20 or 25 years, whether economy has become a lost virtue.

For 100 years economy was the watchword of our statesmen. For 100 years "We stand for economy in government" was a full, resounding phrase that was featured and exploited in every platform of every political party—National, State, and local—as the greatest of all desiderata. Political action in the days of our fathers lost all of its virtue and its beneficent essence unless it was associated with economy. A candidate for office, unless he pledged himself in advance for economy, was beaten before he started. And then, Mr. Chairman, a change came over the spirit of our dreams. The inception of that change is difficult to trace, but it began after the turn of the century. By the beginning of the present decade public servants were thinking in terms of spending rather than saving. A Member of Congress was judged not by the amount of money he could save the taxpayers but by the amount of money he could extract from the Treasury till for the benefit of his district.

Unfortunately that judgment and that appraisal still stand in the mysterious processes of public thinking, only more accentuated than ever. It is the go-getter—the best grabber—and not the money saver who garners popular applause. Sometimes I marvel over the modern psychology which seems to say, "Economy go hang! The way to bring about prosperity is to spend money, and we want our share."

That kind of thinking reminds me of a man I once worked for, who undertook to build a handsome, new office structure to house his business when he did not have money enough to pay the architect's fee. He was a man of great brilliancy of mind, but he lacked the practical touch. He borrowed and borrowed until he was head over heels in debt at every bank in town. Finally a friend, remonstrating with him, said, "You shouldn't borrow so much money from the banks."

"Why," he replied in astonishment, "I thought that is what banks are for."

It seems to me that the myriads of interests that are engaged these days in pulling money out of the United States Treasury must be guided by the same benign philosophy that actuated my old employer. If you were to press them for an explanation, they probably would exclaim:

"Why, I thought that is what the Treasury is for."

Such is the modern psychology. It is a far cry back to the days of rugged honesty and simplicity, when the main objective of our fathers and mothers, which they never lost sight of in all their lives of toil and self-denial, was freedom from debt and the satisfaction that comes from owing no one. I am no apologist for the "horse and buggy" era, but I cannot agree that we of our time, struggling with a welter of debt, obligations, and taxes, are any happier than they were in their day and generation. Our forefathers stood for public and private economy with a capital "E" and for the discharge of their responsibilities according to the strict letter. My good father would have walked 10 miles to pay a debt of 10 cents when it was due if there was no other way to get there. That was the pioneer spirit.

We on the Appropriations Committee, who sit in judgment on the claims of the governmental activities for appropriations, have to meet the spending campaign head-on. We see the grabbing orgy in its fullest flower and fruition. I think we would fall dead from surprise if some departmental or bureau chief were to come before us and voluntarily offer to accept a reduction in his appropriation below the current year. Such a thing never occurs. Perhaps it is not human nature that it should occur. Every bureau chief who has pride in his work thinks his activity is the most worth-while activity in the entire range of the Government, and he comes before us bubbling over with enthusiasm and eagerness to secure a larger appropriation in order to expand its operations.

I sometimes think that we members of the Appropriations Committee have the toughest job in the world. If we were to grant all of the requests submitted to us, we would please everybody, but there would not be even a bottom left in the United States Treasury; whereas when we remember the taxpayers and do what we conceive to be our duty to them, we tread on the toes of the bureau chiefs and unleash opposition that often finds its way into Congress to checkmate and discredit our efforts.

An Appropriations Committee member finds no other task quite so difficult these days as the task of trying to be economical. And yet I, for one, believe that unpopular though we may, and do, make ourselves, we are performing a real public service when we hew to the line of economy. Nothing else would be so heartening to the business world, nothing else so stimulating to real recovery and to the restoration of normal jobs in industry as the knowledge that we are making an actual start in the direction of a balanced Budget.

While I am talking about the need for economy I cannot refrain from expressing my amazement over some of the publications issued by certain Government activities, publications that have all of the features of sales propaganda, with enormous type to catch the eye, florid illustrations, and appealing arguments to arouse the interest of the readers. These publications are as hard on the pocketbooks of the taxpayers as they are interesting and novel. There is, for instance, the First Annual Report of the Resettlement Administration which I will put up against any other Government report in the history of America from the standpoint of originality, with full confidence that my entry will win.

The front and rear backs of this document are medleys in color, showing attractive homesteads, happy farmers holding Government grants in their hands, cackling hens, and contented cows grazing placidly. In one respect the illustrations indicate a slight variation from Nature, as all of the cows are a brilliant red. The report contains 173 pages printed on highly calendered paper and illustrated copiously.

I asked the Public Printer how many copies of this report were printed, the total cost, and what they would have cost without the artistic features, and he replied:

> Total number printed for the Resettlement Administration was 3,100 copies. In addition there were printed 384 copies for depository libraries and international exchanges, as provided by law, and 300 copies for the Superintendent of Documents for sale.
> Total cost of all copies printed, $4,051.25.
> The cost without illustrations and embellishments would have been $3,108.86.

Another document of extraordinary character, also highly embellished, is the one entitled "Possibilities of Shelterbelt Planting in the Plains Region." This is an artistic report, on a superquality of paper with many illustrations, and in reply to an inquiry as to its cost the Public Printer says:

> I am pleased to advise that there was a total of 5,000 copies printed for the Emergency Conservation Work (Forest Service) and the total cost was $4,011.64.

Here we have two reports not in the ordinary style of plain printing that usually characterizes Government reports but decorated and embellished in the *n*th degree and the cost of the two was $8,062.89—the price of a good Indiana farm.

These may be little things compared with the vast sweep of governmental expenditures, but they are important because they are symptomatic of a prevailing predilection among many bureau chiefs to overlook the economies that should be our concern at this time when we are trying with terrible seriousness to stage a comeback from the worst depression our country ever has known.

I am not disposed to be too critical of officials who allow their zeal to lead them to such lengths in their efforts to do a good job, as they see it; but I do say that such unwarranted expenditures should immediately cease. These are just samples of extravagant practices that have grown up in many of the bureaus, every one of which should be eradicated as soon as possible.

The Joint Committee on Printing, of which our distinguished friend, Mr. LAMBETH, is chairman, has taken steps to curb this extraordinary publicity practice. With Mr. LAMBETH on that committee is Mr. RICH, of Pennsylvania, author of the pertinent phrase, "Where are you going to get the money?"—one of the real economists in Congress. Mr. BARRY, of New York, is the other House member. The Senate wing of the joint committee includes Senator HAYDEN, of Arizona; Senator WALSH, of Massachusetts; and Senator VANDENBERG, of Michigan.

At its last meeting on February 3 the Joint Committee on Printing, having the ornate Resettlement report in mind, adopted a rule directing the Public Printer whenever a manuscript is presented for printing that involves more than $500 additional expense for color printing and embellishments to submit the manuscript to the joint committee for its approval or disapproval before proceeding with the printing. This rule applies to all manuscripts submitted to the Government Printing Office from whatever source they may come. This is a move in the direction of real economy, and I congratulate the gentleman from North Carolina and his associates on their solicitude for that too often forgotten man—the humble taxpayer.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BINDERUP.]

Mr. BINDERUP. Mr. Chairman, I am so very conscious of the magnitude of the subject I wish to discuss briefly this afternoon that I hesitated somewhat to take this time, realizing that my efforts, limited by so short a time, can hardly cause the slightest ripple on the waters of the great sea of public opinion. I realize the fact, Mr. Chairman, that to undertake to relate the history of our Uncle Sam and go back to the date of his birth, over 150 years ago, and to try to say anything that is worth while in 10 or 15 minutes is almost impossible. And yet, spurred on by the realization of the importance of the subject, I have taken these 15 minutes and I am thankful to you for this privilege.

In speaking to you once more about Uncle Sam's hospital chart I wish to say this: This is not just a little chart that was drawn up in a few minutes; this chart is not the result of a momentary impulse, but rather the result of years of study, based on Uncle Sam's history of depressions, the cause and history of those responsible and the principles involved, and every word and every comma and period on that chart is a cue to some historical event or to some statistics of importance in connection with collapses of Uncle Sam.

If in retrospect you could see with me the anxiety, the chills and the fever and the collapses of our Uncle Sam in each one of these 26 depressions, panics, and collapses; if I might hold up before you a magic mirror that you might see the past as I shall endeavor from time to time to show it to you; if you could realize the misery and want, the starvation and the deprivation, the tears and sorrows and suffering, the suicides, the murders, the destruction of the great institutions of civilization that have been wrecked in these collapses—all man-made—I know there would come a response in action as well as in words. I know we will not have time to study this chart, so I am setting it up before you that you may get a flash picture in your mind of the wavering health of our Uncle Sam, described by the red lines on the chart. And then in my few brief minutes I will tell you a little of the reason why these man-made panics came upon our Nation.

When was the germ created that caused our great Nation to collapse 26 times in its short history? That germ was created when the people were deprived of their constitutional right and privilege of coining and regulating their own money—money that is the sacred measurement; money that measures the sweat of the brow of man. It was born in that historic moment when Alexander Hamilton and Thomas Jefferson discussed that very important plank of the Constitution of the United States which provided that the people shall coin their own money and regulate the value—value that is determined by the abundance of money, as money measures values by and according to its own abundance.

And when Thomas Jefferson, the great champion of the people's cause, had lost in this great battle with Alexander Hamilton over the establishing of the United States Bank—a private bank—he said later in life that this was his greatest battle, and that it was the greatest loss politically he had endured in his life. And when his friends came to him to console him, Thomas Jefferson answered, as you will recall:

> I grieve not for myself, for I shall have died long before this piece of evil legislation bears its fruits; but I weep for posterity; I weep for the Nation I love.

Sometimes, when I have weighed these words of Thomas Jefferson, I have thought to myself: "O Thomas Jefferson, you great statesman, you who could peer beyond the wall of unborn time, you said you grieved for posterity and you wept for the Nation you loved. Tell me, O Spirit of Thomas Jefferson, when you said you grieved for posterity, could you see in that picture of the future our great people in distress, with millions cold and hungry, in a land of unlimited resources and unlimited credit? When you said you grieved for the Nation you loved, tell me, was it our great Nation of today you could see torn by strife, by threatened radicalism, communism, and decay? For today it is we that grieve for our own and for posterity."

Yes, we, too, grieve for the Nation we love, especially when we realize that the last collapse our Nation is suffering has lasted 17 years, started in 1920, and was amplified and its effect multiplied in 1929. It is then we realize the seriousness of our situation and the truth of what Thomas Jefferson said when he stated that he wept for the Nation he loved. Mr. Chairman, in these 15 minutes, no matter how high I might hold the torch of reason, no matter how bright the rays from that beacon light may be, how little, after all, I could tell you about these collapses of Uncle Sam. So let me skip the '24 and come down to the panic of 1920, at least for the present, because I can explain the situation in 1920 quite easily, because you Members of Congress lived it and you endured it. You breathed the air of 1920, and today you are still experiencing the results of the panic of 1920.

Yes, my friends, today, at the dawning of a new prosperity, we are busy sweeping aside the ashes of the past, and on this miserable foundation we are striving to again build up a new prosperity, a prosperity that will live for just a few years only, for the reason that we have not solved the cause. We have not removed the germ of destruction, and in another few years our Uncle Sam will have another collapse. And remember what I told you in my last week's talk: Every collapse is more severe than the preceding one. How did it happen that this great Nation of ours fell from the highest plane of prosperity, with the happiest people, when we were building the great institutions of civilization higher and higher, up into the unfathomable heights of human advancement? When Winston Churchill stood in the halls of England and pointed to this great Nation, he said, in substance, this:

> Behold a nation that has achieved the greatest success in government, when labor practically consumes the products of its own hands.

Was not this a wonderful statement? Yes, Mr. Chairman; when labor consumes the products of its own hands, that is distribution, that is government, that is consuming power, that is purchasing power; that is the motive, that is the spirit that turns the wheels of industry; that is the thing that determines when a nation is a great nation and when a government is a great government.

Then another great statesman followed Churchill, some time afterward, in England and said:

> Rome in all its glory and its golden age was not as great as was the United States in 1920, or until the 18th day of May 1920, at 12 o'clock.

That is when the panic of 1920 started; and may I say that I challenge anyone to deny the statement that this panic started at 12 o'clock on the 18th day of May 1920. Oh, no; not in this building; not in this room. It was merely in this room that the Representatives of the people forgot. It was here that we forgot that the cost of liberty is eternal vigilance, and that the only reason we are here, and the reason government was instituted among men, is just for one purpose—for the protection of the worthy weak against the greedy strong. It was here that Congress was in session and, busy with other minor matters, forgot to guard the toiling masses against the enemies of humanity: human greed, predatory wealth, and the pirates of finance. But it was not here that the crime was committed.

It was committed in the city of Washington, next to the White House, in the Treasury Building. There was a meeting down there; it was a secret meeting. It was held in the office of W. P. J. Harding, Governor of the Federal Reserve Board of the Federal Reserve banks. There were about 50 bankers assembled, representing the combined fortune of billions of dollars. These 50 bankers assembled there for a certain purpose, and so definite are the facts connected with this meeting that we know definitely now that this panic, under which we are still suffering, started then and there at about 12 o'clock noon on the 18th day of May 1920, in that room, by those men, except that among these men were Mr. John Skelton Williams, a friend of the people, and the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. David F. Huston. This combination of bankers, these wizards of finance, representing the hounds of money monopoly, these vultures of greed for money, these, my friends, are the enemies of our Nation, speaking of them as a class. They had assembled down there by invitation of Mr. Harding, Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, of the Federal Reserve Advisory Council, and 34 of the 36 class A directors, together with a majority of the reactionary members of the Federal Reserve Board, were present. Class A directors, representing the Government, and class B directors, representing business, were not there. It was a secret meeting. I have oftentimes wondered why, because the Republican Party had been so honest with us. They said to us before the election of Mr. Harding in 1920, and I quote from the Republican platform exactly what they said:

> We pledge ourselves to a courageous defiation of credit and currency.

And then President Harding said, and I clipped this from one of his speeches:

> If I am elected President, I pledge myself to use my efforts to give back to the dollar its purchasing power.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BINDERUP. In a minute. They assembled down there for a certain premeditated purpose. From the Pacific coast and from Canada and the Gulf of Mexico they had come. It was not to wreck our Nation, it was to enrich themselves, and by so doing they did wreck our Nation; they had assembled because we had had a great war, and in this war we had inflated and inflated because we had a foolish, incompetent monetary banking system and we had voted billions of dollars worth of bonds, and we had a banking and currency plan in these United States where the banks could deposit these bonds back in the Treasury of the United States and the Government would issue currency dollar for dollar on every cent of the bond and give this currency back to the banks and allow the banks to continue to draw their interest besides.

And so we inflated and inflated. Besides that, because the banks had only to keep a reserve of 2½ and 7 percent, they had a right to lend every dollar 10 and 15 times and more and still draw their interest on every dollar, whether it existed or not. So with such a system of inflation in 1920 we raised the price levels on the gold standard. We were on the gold standard pure and simple, absolutely 100 percent monometallism, and with this gold standard we raised the price level to a point of inflation that the Nation had never seen before. They have told us about the safety of measuring values by the gold standard, the most treacherous standard you could possibly inaugurate. It had an index of purchasing power in 1913 of 145 and robbed the debtors, and then fell to 60 in May 1920, and robbed the creditors; then again defrauded debtors by raising to 107 in 1921 and 167 in 1933; that robbed the farmer of his farm and the laboring man of his home. And so they had a meeting down there because we had inflated all of these values.

But there was one thing that did not raise in price; there was one thing an abundance of money could not raise in price. Interest did not raise in proportion to commodities. Interest was black on white, written with pen and ink on paper. These bankers had billions of dollars of the people's obligations, Government bonds, State bonds, and private notes and mortgages, all long-time paper, running for 20 or 40 years. And as prices of commodities rose, interest stayed there as it was, black on white. They could not change the figures on their obligations without going to jail, but they knew another way, because they had read Adam Smith, the father of political economy, and he had told them how they could raise the purchasing power of interest without raising the figures on bonds and notes and mortgages held against the people.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BINDERUP. I would like to finish. I have only 15 precious minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I want to ask the gentleman one brief question.

Mr. BINDERUP. And what is that?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. This secret meeting the gentleman is talking about was held during the administration of Mr. Wilson, was it not?

Mr. BINDERUP. No; it was held after his administration. It was on the 18th day of May 1920.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. That was during the administration of Mr. Wilson.

Mr. BINDERUP. Was it or was it not?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. BINDERUP. Regardless of all that, the meeting was held May 18, 1920. I am sorry to be diverted from my chain of thought, but I want to stop to answer the gentleman and to say that this is not a political issue at the present time and was not a political issue then.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I am not trying to bring out the fact that it is a political issue. I merely wanted to bring out the fact that that meeting occurred during the Wilson administration.

Mr. BINDERUP. I understand, but even when you bring out such a fact and say it is not political, I know what the gentleman means, and I know and we understand that it is for a political purpose.

So we raised the price level higher and higher and they knew, these wizards of finance, as I say, because they had read political economy and they had experimented on Uncle Sam many times before, they knew how to make that interest buy more labor and the products of labor. They knew they had to crush the price level down, that had been crushed down 24 times before in our Nation, and they knew that other nations had taken money out of circulation and lowered prices and increased the purchasing power of money. They knew and understood that money measures values by its own abundance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 minutes more.

Mr. BINDERUP. If I have 5 minutes more, I think I can finish.

Mr. UMSTEAD. I cannot resist the gentleman. I yield him 5 minutes more.

Mr. BINDERUP. They knew they had to contract the volume of money and credit and bring prices down to increase the purchasing power of interest. All they had to do was to take money out of circulation; and so those 50 wizards of finance that met up there at that particular time followed the suggestion of John Perrin, who was Chairman of the Board and Federal Reserve agent of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco. He suggested that they immediately take out of circulation $2,000,000,000 of Federal Reserve currency, restricting loans and contracting credit by burning up or destroying or locking up this amount of Federal Reserve currency. They knew what they were doing. They talked at length about taking $2,000,000,000 out of circulation; $2,000,000,000 of basic Federal Reserve currency out of circulation by contracting loans and refusing to make new loans. I want to tell you a bit more about that meeting. I happen to have the minutes of that meeting in my possession, and in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 1932 I read where in this Congress you incorporated the speech of John Simpson, who related what had happened in this meeting, as related by John Skelton Williams, so this is familiar to many of you. When John Perrin, the big banker of San Francisco, suggested taking $2,000,000,000 out of circulation, it was John Skelton

Williams, the humane Comptroller of the Currency and a devoted friend to the people, appointed by Woodrow Wilson, who rose and said:

Why, gentlemen, you cannot take $2,000,000,000 out of circulation; that is 25 percent of the wheels of commerce. That is one-fourth of the lifeblood in the veins and arteries of trade and commerce in Uncle Sam's system; you cannot take that out without a great crash. You will thereby collapse our great Nation. Do you not realize that our financial system, the banking system of our Nation, is builded on a strange precarious foundation, like a mist, a cloud, a shadow, a vision, a strange mystic intangible foundation called "confidence"? Just a little spark that exists only in the brain of man. Can you not realize that if you give such a shock to our financial system you will snuff out that little spark of confidence and the whole financial system of the United States will collapse?

They answered John Skelton Williams and said, in substance, this: "We have too many small banks, anyway. What we need is a large chain banking system." Again they discussed the situation of taking the people's money away from them, and once more John Skelton Williams arose and said:

Do you not realize that the farmers and laboring people of this great Nation have all got mortgages on their farms and homes? Can you not see that by creating a scarcity of money you will increase mortgages, measured in human effort, and wipe out all equities, and that the farmers and the laboring people will wake up some morning and find the only thing they have left is the mortgage on their homes? Their equities will have been wiped out—disappeared like the dew before a summer sun. Do you not realize that the merchant who buys goods and puts them on the shelf has bought them on a certain price level? You cannot crush this price level down any more than you could crowd yourself into a suit of clothes that you wore when you were 10 years old. You cannot crowd the price level down. You bought your goods, your homes, and your farms, and made your future contracts on a certain price level. When you crowd that price level down you create misery and want and starvation and deprivation and bread lines and soup kitchens; you invite war and pestilence, suicides, and crime. You crush Uncle Sam, and in this way will destroy his life, and he will follow in the same path as nations of the past that lived once but are no more, covered by the dust of time and forgotten but for a few yellow pages in history.

Every nation that ever was or ever will be can be destroyed if you crush down a price level, thereby creating extreme poverty, making the rich richer and the poor poorer, dividing a people, whereby one class dies of lust and luxury, idleness, and overindulgence, and the other class dies of misery and want, poverty, and starvation, and a nation with a people divided will fall. To crush down the price level without the results I have told you is as impossible as putting a chicken back in the shell 2 weeks after it has been hatched.

When John Skelton Williams pleaded to the wizards of finance for the farmer and the laboring man, warning them that these would lose their farms and homes, they answered him and said, in substance, this: "Well, the farmers and the laboring people have made a lot of money during and after the war. They will stand it all right." They knew and understood this would mean a crash. If you doubt this, listen to the words of Governor Harding, who presided at this meeting:

There are two remedies that suggest themselves; first, a reduction in the volume of credit, credit contraction—meaning taking money out of circulation. That is a drastic remedy; it is unpleasant medicine. The other method is to build up production—meaning to let the farmer overproduce and the laboring man create enough commodities to bring the price down so that interest could buy more farm products and products of labor.

And they selected the former method, taking the people's money out of circulation.

And so, my friends, it took these few mighty bankers who held in their own hands the magic wand of money power, some 50 of them, although a few of them did object and remonstrated against this drastic procedure, less than 2 hours to destroy the prosperity and happiness of a great Nation and of a great people, and it has now taken us over 17 years, costing billions of dollars and costing thousands of lives and immeasurable sorrow and suffering to our people, to try to overcome this crime committed by predatory plundering combinations of money monopoly. It has filled our prisons and poorhouses, hospitals, and cemeteries. And so a mighty nation crashed from the highest plains of prosperity, and a happy people, who were building the great institutions of civilization higher and higher by leaps and bounds, into the unfathomable heights of human advancement, were reduced to misery and want.

Sophocles, the Greek philosopher, was right when he wrote:

No power for good or ill can equal the power of money. This lays cities low. This drives man forth from a quiet dwelling place.

Yes, my friends; while at the same time it builds on yonder heights castles to the rich, in the vale it builds a church or a cathedral to a God whose judgment is feared, or in some conspicuous place it builds a library or museum or some great monument to satisfy the vanity of man, that suffering humanity might forget.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I shall not use the 10 minutes.

In looking through the hearings on this bill I find myself in a researching mood with reference to the reciprocal-trade agreements, the neutrality bill, and our policy of defense and offense. The research brings me to this little statement which I find in the March 2 issue of the Washington Times:

JAPANESE DIET TALKS OF UNITED STATES "ATTACK"

TOKYO, March 2.—Possibility of an American naval and air attack upon Japan was discussed by the Japanese Diet today when the naval budget for 1937–38 was submitted.

In answer to interpellations, Navy Minister Mitsumasa Yonai told the Diet that by 1940, when the present Japanese building program is complete, the island empire "may feel itself secure against American attack."

During the discussions the public and press at one time were barred from the chamber, but enough of the debate was open to make it clear that the Navy is demanding huge appropriations chiefly because of the "danger" of an American attack.

In the course of the conversations Yonai emphasized that Japan will not alter her present naval construction to match the new $7,500,000,000 program of Great Britain, or any new construction undertaken by the United States. He gave the impression he regards the present Japanese program as ample.

Several deputies asked the Navy Minister bluntly whether the present armament programs of Japan and other nations were aimed at the future wars. He replied:

"Our present expenditures will be for war materials to the extent of 79 percent."

Yonai conjured up an interesting if imaginative picture of American aggression in the Far East. He commented:

"Suppose that the United States sent airplanes to Japan via the Kurile Islands, Hawaii, and the South Seas? In that event, Japan would certainly be menaced."

The Minister also takes the position that he will not fear any attack by the United States after the Japanese program has been completed up to 1940. Mr. Chairman, the United States Pacific is a great vast waste. From our Pacific, or California shore, to Hawaii is approximately 2,200 miles with nothing but water in between. Between Hawaii and the Philippine Islands we have very little territory that could possibly produce any revenue whatsoever for the United States or serve as a basis of any kind of defense whatsoever. We are, however, building stepping stones from our Pacific coast to the Philippine Islands through the establishment of air service. Those stepping stones run east and west. Another country is building stepping stones running north and south from Kamchatski's Arctic shores to the Equator, and in establishing their lines of commerce and air defense and air entrenchment they cross at about Guam the line of stepping stones built by the United States.

For approximately 8,000 miles you can travel the Japanese equatorial empire and be near Japanese soil at all times. Those islands are all rich in production of goods suitable and adaptable to the uses of mankind. I find myself dreaming about what kind of defense Japan could put up in the event those islands are fortified and, whether fortified or not, how those islands could be used for the purpose of landing aircraft. Almost any little coconut lagoon would be suitable for landing a great airplane that could do considerable damage in times of war. So then I come around to the thought: Are we building a Navy for the defense of the continental United States, including Hawaii and we will say Alaska; or are we building a Navy for the purpose of defending so-called American rights or American investments in the Philippine Islands 8,000 miles away, and wherein there is a Japanese Empire of considerable size lying directly between Hawaii and the Philippine Islands?

If we acknowledge parity with Japan insofar as naval armaments are concerned, how effective will our ships be—on a parity basis—in Asiatic or Philippine waters in competition with Japanese naval armaments? Is there any way we can defend investments or people located in the Philippine Islands as against Japan, with her surrounding territory north, east, and south of the Philippine Islands, with Japan fortified as she is now or may be on those islands?

These questions come to my mind in connection with neutrality, reciprocal trade agreements, and armament for defense or offense as the case may be. In the case of reciprocal-trade agreements, what attitude is this country to take with the Philippine Islands subsequent to the granting of independence to the Philippines? Are we to maintain military and naval reservations in the Philippine Islands? If so, does the present naval program provide for a defense of those islands and American interests there?

I had hoped that someone in the debate on this bill might discuss the Asiatic or Pacific phase of American defense or offense as related to this bill. If such discussion has taken place I have missed it. To me no naval program is complete unless it clearly sets forth to what extent defense will be maintained for interests of American people in the Pacific. It seems to me that if we are to have very much trouble from a military standpoint it may arise in the North Pacific, where such great armaments are now being concentrated by the powers of Japan, Russia, and the United States. Apparently every time we want to send some naval officer up to the Aleutian Islands to study weather conditions, Japan feels it necessary to send some officer into the South Sea Islands to study weather conditions. So it looks as though weather conditions are being studied on both sides. If we feel it necessary to establish an air base in the Aleutian Islands for the purpose of weather observation, Japan feels it necessary to establish an air base or air station for observation down in some South Pacific island in Japanese mandated territory. So while the bill is being read for amendment, Mr. Chairman, I trust that someone who is more familiar with this question of defense will place before the House concrete information with reference to what, and where, and how, and when we are to defend with this Navy which we are building.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman was over in that territory this last year and made some study of the matter. Would he, from his offhanded judgment, favor the continuation or enlargement of our defenses in the Philippine Islands or would he concentrate nearer home?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, my feeling at the moment is that we give to the people of the Philippine Islands just as quickly as possible their total independence and that we then immediately move out of there, lock, stock, and barrel, leaving no military or naval reservations behind. Subsequent to that step, if we deem it advisable in our reciprocal trade agreement program we may make such trade agreements with the Philippine Islands as fit into our general policy in dealing with that question and thereafter we guarantee to the Philippine Islands no military or naval defense in any way whatsoever, except through our sitting around the table and becoming a party to a neutrality agreement wherein the other powers of the earth join with us to guarantee the neutrality of the Philippine Islands and all to the extent we are no more obligated than the other great powers of the world.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Last year when the great Japanese Kagawa was here he made the statement publicly, and I heard it, at a meeting that 95 percent of the people of Japan were against war, including the rank and file in the army. Does the gentleman believe that statement is true?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I would not agree with that figure. I believe when a study is made with reference to the naval preparations by Japan from the information obtainable you come to the conclusion—at least I do—Japan is planning for the defense of Japanese and nearby territory and is not planning in any way whatsoever for an offense against the United States or any other great power other than China and Russia.

Mr. HILL of Washington. That is the military viewpoint; but the people in Japan and the people in the United States are opposed to it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I cannot agree with the statement of the gentleman from Washington. The pressure of population in Japan is forcing that great power to look about and prepare for additional territory to which her people may go in the years to come. She is making rapid progress now in the Philippine Islands. What we desire here in the United States does not change the geography of the earth. Japan is becoming more and more entrenched in the South Seas between Hawaii and the Philippines and southward toward the Equator. There are vast areas rich in raw material and particularly the type of commodities so precious in the execution of war of offense and defense. These lands are much nearer to Japan than the United States. The following figures clearly indicate how well Japan is preparing for her future and to what extent she is looking after "nearby" territory from the standpoint of naval preparedness. Only today these figures were furnished to me by the Navy Department:

The following data show the comparative status in combatant ships of the United States, British, and Japanese Navies, brought up to March 1, 1937. The first table shows only under-age vessels on hand, those of first-class military value, and those building or appropriated for. Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BIGELOW].

Mr. BIGELOW. Mr. Chairman, public opinion on the President's Court plan was sampled at Cincinnati last Sunday.

The result may be of interest to the House.

The ballot used called not only for a "yes" or "no" vote on the President's Court plan, but also provided that the voter indicate for which candidate he had voted for President last fall.

The meeting was free and open to the public. A special invitation, however, had been sent to 1,000 persons who had sent letters and telegrams from Cincinnati opposing the President's plan.

This meeting was held in the Emery Auditorium, February 28, under the auspices of the People's Church.

The ballots, 1,123 in all, revealed the fact that 587 present had voted last fall for Roosevelt, 398 had voted for Lemke, 50 had voted for Landon, and 20 for Thomas.

Less than 10 percent of those who had voted for Roosevelt opposed the President's plan. But while the President lost 9.8 percent of his own followers, he gained 46 percent of the Landon followers, and he gained 73 percent of the Lemke followers.

A 4½ TO 1 MAJORITY

Of all those present, 55 percent had voted for Mr. Roosevelt last fall, but over 81 percent of them supported the Court plan. The vote stood 912 for the President's plan and 211 against it. This 4½ majority for the President's plan contrasted strangely with the telegrams and letters sent in to me from Cincinnati, for these showed a majority of 25 to 1 against the President.

If significance were given to this vote it would indicate that the President's Court proposal is far more popular than was the President himself at the last election. The President's mass support appears to be more than holding its own. It is like "Ole Man River—It don't say nothin', it don't write letters, and it don't send telegrams, but it jes' keeps rollin' along."

I do not wish to overlabor this sample balloting. Another speaker might have talked the same audience into quite a different vote. But I got the impression that the rage against the Court proposals is confined to the newspapers and the corporation lawyers and their clients. The masses of the people want shorter hours and better pay. If packing or unpacking the Court will open the way for hour reductions and pay boosts, it will be all "jake" with the people. Thomas Jefferson did not lose any votes by his set-to with the Court—neither is Mr. Roosevelt likely to.

Certain cults may make a fetish of the Constitution and deify the Court but what the people want is jobs, and decent wages, and a little more than a pauper's share of the Nation's prosperity, and they have a hunch that the Supreme Court blocks their way to these blessings.

My chief reason for supporting the President's proposal is that I fear what may lie just ahead of us. I believe that until far more is done than this administration seems to have in mind our burden of unemployment will, with some fluctuations, grow steadily worse. How much longer can we afford to waste the productive capacity of eight or ten millions of our workers? How long can we pyramid our debts to carry these immense relief and work-relief rolls? The end of this must come and God knows how it may come, or how soon.

TIRED OF WAITING FOR A JOB

One of our relief offices was the scene the other day of a shocking tragedy. A jobless colored man walked into the office and shot down three of the attendants. In explanation he said:

I just got tired of coming here week after week and being told there wasn't any work.

How many crimes like that is it going to take before we feel sufficiently our own social guilt in temporizing with this problem of unemployment? Are we going to wait until such vengeance spreads to the mass and we invite a hurricane of wrath? Democracy will never ride such a storm. This will be the end of the Republic of our dreams.

I fear this result. If it comes, I do not want to be blamed for it. I do not want it said of me that by blocking the President's proposal to modernize the Court I contributed to this revolutionary chaos.

The President says he needs a modern Court. I will vote to give it to him. I will not stand in the way. I will not take that responsibility.

But neither can I take the responsibility for not speaking out and telling the President what I think about him and his Court proposal. I do not think the blame is all with the Court. I think much of the blame is with the President and with Congress. It does seem to me that the President is right; that we need a reasonable interpretation of the Constitution as it stands more than we need amendments to the Constitution.

NOT ALL THE COURT'S FAULT

But this Court issue should not hide from us the fact that, without any interference from the Court, we might have done far more than we have done.

It was not the Supreme Court that foisted on the Nation the old-age insurance plan of the Social Security Act. It was the President and Congress who did that. That is a plan to make the poor pay for their own pensions. It is a plan to save the rich that expense. As a method of taxation it is abominable. It does just the reverse of what the economic situation requires. It is a botch of statesmanship. It reduces the purchasing power of labor, which should be increased. The tax on pay rolls is a sales tax. It reduces the purchasing power of the public, which should be increased. We need to take money from the top and pour it out at the bottom. The Social Security Act takes it from the bottom and spends a huge part of it in an appalling job of bookkeeping and bureaucratic business.

A BAD OLD-AGE PENSION PLAN

Instead of having a swarm of Government officials to keep tab on thirty millions of workers throughout their entire life, in order to make them pay for an old-age pension which will not average over $30 a month for a man and nothing at all for his wife, what the President and Congress should have done was to enlarge the grants in aid to the States. Why keep books on people until they are 65 years of age? Why not forget them until they are 65 and then, if they are alive, pay them a decent pension out of income taxes? A compulsory insurance system supported by a tax on wages and pay rolls is necessarily applicable to only a part of the people, while the benefits are certain to be inadequate for decent old-age support. This compulsory insurance plan should be abandoned and a noncontributory plan should be adopted as a permanent policy. If you attempt to force the masses of the working people to pay out of wages even half the cost of adequate old-age insurance, you are still further reducing purchasing power which is already inadequate for a proper standard of living.

But, as I see it, the most urgent duty before the President and Congress is to adopt, without delay, an effective policy for the complete abolition of unemployment.

Anything would be desirable which would help to so improve the industrial situation that those now unemployed would be automatically absorbed in industry. Some of the legislation needed for this purpose is still held to be unconstitutional. I would put nothing in the way of the President getting such legislation. Neither Congress nor the Court should stand in the way of it.

FACE THIS PROBLEM OF UNEMPLOYMENT

But whatever general improvement may be expected, we should prepare to deal with a serious problem of unemployment as a permanent condition for years to come.

Obviously, the only way to meet this problem is by a greatly expanded public-works program. We should plan enough of this work and spend enough on it to insure every unemployed worker a steady job at better than depression relief wages.

There is no lack of work needing to be done on flood-control projects, rehousing, reforestation, soil preservation, road building, and so forth. Workers so employed should not have to come from relief rolls as at present. There should be no means tests and no implications of public charity.

W. P. A. projects are not now half meeting the need. We shove the rest off on local relief rolls, disregarding the fact that funds for local relief are shamefully inadequate. If we are going to give these people more than empty words, if we are actually going to guarantee all of them the right to work and be useful, and that is their right, we shall have to stop talking about balancing the Budget and agree to vastly larger expenditures. How such an expanded public-works program should best be supported is debatable, but I do not think that increased taxation and increased borrowing are the only alternatives. I would like to see this Congress lay upon the President a mandate to issue Treasury notes to any extent necessary to keep enough desirable public works going to entirely abolish the shame and the danger of the mass unemployment which is engendered by our economic system.

To the Congress, and especially to the President of the United States, I want to say that I think the masses of the American people favor a reorganization of the Supreme Court because they think it will bring them relief from the twin evils that they suffer—unemployment and low pay.

YOUR RESPONSIBILITY, MR. PRESIDENT

But in being given this power to reorganize the Court the President is shouldering an awful responsibility. For then the people will begin to say to him: "We have given you the power you asked for. Now where is our relief? Where are our jobs? Where is our increased pay?" With the Court reorganized, Congress and the President will have all the power they need to absolutely abolish unemployment and poverty in this land. If in the years of this administration this is not done, I think the popularity of the President on coming into his second term will be more than equaled by his unpopularity in going out, and we, as Congressmen, will be covered with the deserved opprobrium of an indignant people.

And if the bright hopes of this hour are thus turned to disappointment and bitterness we may well tremble for the future of democracy in our land and throughout the world.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEAVY].

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Chairman, I feel that it is only fair to my colleagues here in this body and to my constituents who commissioned me to come here that I frankly state my position in reference to the President's proposal in connection with the Federal court, and my reasons for taking the stand that I do.

At the outset, I want to say that I recognize the tremendous importance of the judicial branch of government in our political structure. It is not fair to say that it is more important than the legislative and executive branches, because such is not the fact. Neither is it fair to state that the judicial department is less important than either of the other two. Each, in its own sphere, has its importance. I certainly would not support any proposal to take away from the judiciary its independence of action in its particular field.

It would be well to say too, here, that by no stretch of the imagination, can anyone say that the proposal has any bearing on the personal guarantees in the Constitution. Every safeguard of personal liberty is preserved. The proposal certainly is not open to attack upon this ground. None need have the slightest fear of any loss of personal liberty now possessed. I am ready to take my stand with the President in his proposal. [Applause.]

I. THREE DEPARTMENTS OF GOVERNMENT NECESSARY

The problem that confronts us for solution in connection with the President's proposal is not one of depriving the Supreme Court of its independence, or powers conferred upon it by the Constitution and the laws that Congress has enacted thereunder. The problem is rather one of securing within the powers granted to the legislative and executive departments a personnel on the Supreme Court that will view the provisions of the Constitution of the United States in the light of present-day conditions, in order that the Nation may continue to exist under a constitutional form of government.

Judicial interpretation of constitutional provisions must be broad enough to recognize the importance of the other two branches of government. When the executive and legislative departments of the Government seek to cure dangerous, destructive, and threatening situations resulting in great injury to millions of citizens, such efforts must not be nullified by the judicial branch of our Government. This is exactly what has been occurring in reference to major New Deal measures. Unless we can secure a fair distribution of our national income, and assure to our citizenship a greater degree of social justice, then, indeed, our constitutional form of government is in serious danger.

II. WE ARE LEARNING ABOUT OUR GOVERNMENT

Whatever the ultimate outcome of the President's proposal may be, it has already resulted in great good to the American people. Millions of people who heretofore gave no thought to constitutional grants of power and constitutional limits of power, are now receiving a liberal education concerning our Government. There undoubtedly is, and will continue to be, better understanding of what constitutional government means in this country. Citizens are coming to a recognition of the fact that no department of government is sacred nor above constructive criticism. During the recent past, a sort of halo has been placed around the Supreme Court of the United States and this sentiment, to a degree, carried over into the inferior Federal courts. A life position given to any man does not change the inherent nature, disposition, or manner of thought of that man. The natural tendency would be that it would result in a more dictatorial attitude than would otherwise be shown. There is a vast distinction between independence of thought and action, and arbitrary dictatorship.

III. MANDATE OF THE PEOPLE

In the general elections of 1932, 1934, and again in 1936, with ever-increasing majorities, the American people have expressed themselves in favor of the social, humane, and economic legislation proposed by the President. With a few exceptions, every New Deal proposal that the Congress has enacted into law which has reached the Supreme Court, has been by judicial decree nullified. There are now pending cases in the Supreme Court challenging every major legislative enactment of recent date which seeks to better the condition of the common man and woman in America.

The Supreme Court, by its decisions, has said that it is unconstitutional—

First. To prohibit child labor as a national policy.

Second. To fix a low-wage limit for women workers, either as a State or national policy.

Third. To authorize labor to bargain collectively.

Fourth. To collect a tax to help the farmer.

Fifth. To legislate on old-age pensions, as in the recent Railroad Retirement Act.

These holdings indicate very strongly that it will further rule that the Federal Government cannot protect the individual businessman and merchant from the threat of destruction now confronting him by the great monopolies and chains.

IV. CRITICISMS OF PRESIDENT'S PROPOSAL UNJUSTIFIED

The charge that the President's proposal is unheard of, cannot be supported by facts. American history discloses that the number of judges on the Supreme Court has been changed six times by congressional action. The Court was established with six members in 1789. Twelve years later its membership was reduced to five, and six years later it was increased to seven. Thirty years later, or in 1837, it was increased to nine. This was during the administration of Andrew Jackson.

In 1863, two years after the beginning of the Civil War, when the great Lincoln was President, the Court was increased to 10 members. Three years later, when Andrew Johnson was carrying on his fight with the Congress, it was reduced to seven members. Then, finally, in 1869, with President Grant in the White House, it was increased to nine members.

Study of American history in those periods will reveal that the changes in the Court were made largely because the Court had ceased to be responsive to the needs of the Nation at that time in its interpretation of the Federal Constitution. An impartial student of history would be compelled to admit that each change tended to build firmer the foundations of American government. He would have to admit further that had the personnel of the Supreme Court in 1857 been made up of men who were conscious of changing times and conditions, there never would have been a Dred Scott decision. It is not unreasonable to conclude likewise, that there never would have been a bloody four years of Civil War.

V. JUDICIAL MISTAKES DANGEROUS

Judicial decisions can far more easily wreck or even completely destroy constitutional government in America than can either legislative or executive action. Judicial mistakes become guideposts to be followed through future years, legislative and executive mistakes are always subject to correction at the next general election.

It has not been 90 days since I left 10 years of active service upon the highest trial bench of my State. I feel that I can reflect, in a small degree, the judicial viewpoint. I am conscious in a small measure, likewise, of the tremendous power that must be placed in the judiciary. I know the importance of an independent judiciary to our system of government.

VI. INDEPENDENCE OF THE JUDICIARY WOULD NOT BE DESTROYED

The proposal of the President is granted by all who have ever read article III, section 1, of the Constitution to be perfectly constitutional. It is strictly within the provisions of that great document.

President Roosevelt has already carried us through one of our great national crises which reached its climax about the time he took office in March 1933. He has demonstrated his patriotism, honesty, and loyalty to American principles and ideals equal to that of any President in all of our history. Would any person charge him with stultifying himself and the high office he occupies by requiring a pledge of any man he might appoint to the Supreme Court before he made such appointment? I am sure none but the most selfish and bitter partisan would do this.

What I have just said will scarcely be challenged by anyone who wants to be fair. All of us know that any new judge appointed will compare favorably in character, learning, and patriotic impulses with the distinguished men who now serve on the Supreme Court and who in the years gone by have served on that great Court. Why should there be this hue and cry of "packing" the Court? Why this charge that the President's proposal is proceeding beyond the broad outlines of the Constitution itself?

The answer to these questions is largely found in the fact that New Deal legislation enacted, and that proposed, is in the interest of the common people of America. This legislation limits, restrains, and restricts special privilege and human greed. It is the beneficiaries of present day social injustices who are using every agency at their command to mislead and poison the mind of the American public. The identical forces that fought the reelection of President Roosevelt last November are fighting this proposal. The appeal that they make is not to reason nor in most instances is it based upon facts. It is designed to arouse the emotion of fear that all men possess. It will not, and cannot, succeed in this crisis because the fear generated by the insecurity and the privation now suffered by the American people exceeds that of any fear that the President's opponents can set in motion.

It is a fact that the leaders of the Republican Party are unanimously opposed to this program. Such opposition is purely partisan and for the sole purpose of being later used in political campaigns. This matter, however, should rise above a partisan basis. If you believe conditions of the Hoover administration are what you want, then you should oppose the judicial reform proposal. If you believe that there is no place in America for extreme poverty, enforced idleness, and the misery that comes from insufficient food, clothing, and shelter, where we have an abundance of all these material things, then you should support the President's judicial reform program.

VII. CONSTITUTIONAL POWERS

The most profound student of the Federal Constitution will not contend that anywhere within that document can language be found granting the Supreme Court power to declare legislative acts unconstitutional. In the early case of Marbury v. Madison, Justice John Marshall enunciated the doctrine of implied powers. I have no fault to find with the Court passing upon the constitutionality of Federal acts. They have perhaps gained that right by the doctrine of prescription. It has been acquiesced in too long to be now denied. The President's proposal does not in any way encroach upon this power.

The implied power to test the constitutionality of a legislative act being granted and that power in no way being limited by the President's proposal, then why should it be said that he is setting up a dictatorship, that he is "packing" the Court, that American liberties are threatened, or that ulterior forces seek to destroy constitutional government?

The President's proposal would bring men fresh from present-day life and from close contact with present-day conditions onto the Supreme Bench with a degree of frequency sufficient to insure an interpretation of that great document in keeping with its spirit and viewed from existing conditions. Such interpretations would make it a living, growing instrument of government. It would be, as its framers intended, an instrument of creation, not an instrument of destruction, such as recent interpretations have tended to make of it.

Granting the implied power that the Supreme Court has taken unto itself, to interpret legislative acts, it does not follow that the Court should go beyond the field of judicial interpretation.

The Court in the last 25 years has shown a constant tendency to invade and restrict the legislative and executive branches of the Government. The situation prevailing now and that has prevailed for sometime past is that five men can force their personal opinions relative to political, economic, and social conditions upon 130,000,000 people. The critics of the President say we are helpless unless we amend the Constitution.

VIII. NUMBER AND QUALIFICATION OF JUDGES

The framers of the Constitution left to the legislative and executive branches of the Government the power without limitation of fixing the number and qualifications of the men who sit upon the Supreme Court. Congress has the power not alone to fix the number of Judges that that Court shall have from time to time, it has the power to fix limitations as to their age, as to their personal professional fitness, as to whether they must be natural born or naturalized. Personally I would favor legislation providing an age limit, at least that now fixed for the President. It might even be wise that instead of being 35 years of age, such judges should be at least 45. I think the President should be limited to appointing none but natural-born American citizens. There is nothing in the Constitution that requires legal training or previous judicial experience for those appointed to the Federal courts. For 150 years every appointee to the Bench has been a man trained and educated in the legal profession. I am sure that all future appointees would come from the same profession. If there be fear that men unfit in the matter of training, experience, age, or nativity would be appointed, that could very easily be remedied by a legislative act.

From all of this it is evident that the framers of the Constitution did not intend to set members of the Supreme Court upon a high pedestal, separate and apart from all other citizens or public officials. As a matter of fact, we all know that becoming a Judge of the Supreme Court cannot, and does not, make a man a saint, and does not in itself make of him a wise man. What a man is, and was, before he became a Judge, he will be after. If there are any who fear that the President might not wisely select his new appointees, that fear should be allayed by the safeguard in the law requiring that before such a man could become a Judge a critical Senate must confirm the appointment.

IX. ABUSE OF CONSTITUTIONAL POWER

The Supreme Court of the United States, since it has assumed the power to interpret legislative acts, has expanded that power until today there is no act involving a national policy of the Congress, if it fails to meet the political and economic views of five Judges on the Bench, which cannot be declared unconstitutional.

The phrases "interstate commerce", "due process of law", and the "general welfare" have all been so interpreted, defined, and enlarged upon that they virtually leave five Judges of the Supreme Court as the final and absolute source of authority in America. In times like these this is dangerous.

X. AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION

It is suggested that the Constitution be amended to meet the President's proposal. An amendment is useless and unnecessary, because his proposal is conceded to be constitutional.

If an amendment could be submitted which conferred upon Congress express authority to legislate upon all or any part of the problems that have arisen in recent years involving production and distribution, we would have no assurance that it would be effective. The very purposes sought to be affected could be defeated and nullified by judicial decision.

To illustrate, for more than 20 years under a congressional act the United States Government collected an income tax; then suddenly, in 1895, the Supreme Court declared that could no longer be done (Pollock v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, 157 U. S. 429). It is true that they said Congress has the power under the Constitution to tax incomes, but they cannot tax such incomes if they are derived from real or personal property, because such a tax would be a "direct tax." Following this decision there was a national wave of indignation. People had come to realize the menace of great fortunes. Agitation was instituted to amend the Constitution. It was 18 years before the amendment was finally written into the Constitution.

XI. AGAIN THE EFFECTS OF JUDICIAL CONSTRUCTION

We wrote into our Constitution the following language:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census enumeration.

Could any language be written that is plainer than the foregoing? Could even the man and woman who knows no law at all misunderstand this language? Is there room to dispute that here was granted an unrestricted and unlimited authority upon Congress to levy income tax?

The Supreme Court of the United States after the enactment of this amendment found in cases brought before them that—

It was unconstitutional for Congress to levy an income tax against Federal judicial salaries (Evans v. Gore, 253 U. S. 245).

They found that—

An officer who is employed by a State was exempt from paying a Federal income tax (Metcalf and Eddy v. Mitchell, 269 U. S. 514).

They found that—

Income derived in the nature of stock dividends was not in fact income such as contemplated in the constitutional amendment (Eisner v. Macomber, 252 U. S. 189).

They found that—

Income derived from interest collected by owners of State and municipal bonds was not actually income as defined by the sixteenth amendment (Brushaber v. Union Pacific Railway Co., 240 U. S. 1).

The foregoing illustrates how easily by the judicial process of interpretation, the very intent and purpose of a constitutional provision and amendment can be defeated by five men who oppose that which is new and different. This, in spite of the well-recognized rule that the earlier enactment must always give way to the later, in case of conflict.

XII. THE GENERAL WELFARE CLAUSE

The recent six to three decision of the Supreme Court, holding invalid the Triple A law, is perhaps the most glaring instance in American judicial history of a Court leaving the judicial field and going over into the political and legislative field. (United States v. Butler, 56 Sup. Ct. 320 (1936).)

The express grant of powers given the Congress by the Constitution in clause 1, section 8, article I, reads so far as applicable, as follows:

Congress shall have the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises * * * for the general welfare of the United States.

It would seem that even the most untutored layman could read but one thing out of this language, and that is, that Congress shall be the judge of what constitutes "general welfare" when they levy the tax. In the Triple A decision the six Judges who nullified that wholesome piece of legislation which gave the farmers of America the same type of protection that we have for almost a hundred years extended to private industry, said in substance, "We do not believe that the law you have enacted will be for the general welfare."

In writing this decision, the majority of the present Court went so far beyond what most of us had even dreamed was their power as to cause many to wonder whether, in fact, we did not live under a judicial oligarchy instead of under a constitutional form of government. If the "general welfare" clause of the Constitution is to become a subject of judicial interpretation, as have the "interstate commerce" and "due process clauses", then no Congress can enact a law and no President can execute a law feeling sure that it is constitutional.

XIII. CONCLUSION

It is evident that every beneficiary of advantage and privilege wants the Court to remain as it is. They want a Court that thinks in terms of conditions as they used to be. They want a Court that will view legal principles entirely by standards set up at a time when there was neither extreme wealth or extreme poverty. They want a Court, the majority of whom unconsciously serve the country by serving the accumulated wealth of that small group that dominate the industrial, economic, and financial life of this Nation today.

You will find every great industrialist, every great international banker, and every individual who has enjoyed advantage and privilege over his fellows fighting the President's proposal.

I do not find fault with, nor do I intend to criticize, those fine men and women who purely out of patriotic motives oppose the suggested reform in our Federal judiciary. They are sincere. They are entitled to their opinions. We have no right to challenge their good faith. This group, however, is far in the minority of the whole group who are found fighting the President's proposal.

If the American people want legislation within the limitations fixed by the Constitution that will give the American farmer a chance to live and accumulate something to enjoy modern comforts and conveniences, then they will favor the President's proposal. If the American people want the laboring man to get a fair share of what we produce under respectable and decent working conditions, then they will favor the President's proposal. If the American people want the independent businessman and the individual professional man to continue to be a part of our life and to prosper, then they will favor the President's program. If the American people believe that every decent, self-respecting man and woman when they grow old is entitled to live in comfort and enjoy present-day blessings, then they would favor the President's proposal. If the American people want the youth of America to have an opportunity to look into life with hope, then they will favor the President's judicial program.

In my humble judgment, a denial of the right of the American people to govern themselves under their own Constitution, because five men out of 130,000,000 people say they do not approve of the methods being used, is the gravest threat to constitutional government that this Nation has ever had to meet.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVY. I yield.

Mr. KITCHENS. In view of the amendment to the Constitution authorizing the income tax and with respect to the statement of the Supreme Court that it would not apply to salaries received by Federal judges, does not the gentleman think that in any event it would apply to all judges nominated and confirmed after this amendment was adopted?

Mr. LEAVY. Yes; I think it would apply under any circumstances because of the fact it is the last expression of the people in reference to the fundamental law. [Applause.]

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAMILTON].
